NSPE's statement voiced the concerns of many members of the engineering profession who are directly involved with the planning, design, construction, and maintenance of the Nation's bridges and highway systems. I believe the statement is a well prepared document that should be studied by every Member of Congress. I wish to draw my colleagues' attention to this important aspect of our Nation's transportation policy:

THE HIGHWAY AND PUBLIC TRANSPORTATION IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1978 (H.R. 10578)

The National Society of Professional Engineers appreciates this opportunity to present its views on H.R. 10578, the Administration's proposed Highway and Public Transportation Improvement Act of 1978. NSPE is a nonprofit organization representing 75,000 individual members who are involved in virtually every aspect of engineering.

NSPE has not had the opportunity to review the Administration's proposals in great depth and because of this will confine its remarks to those items falling within existing policy. We have, however, established an expert's committee that will thoroughly review the proposal and we expect to have the results of their work available for the Committee's use late in March. When we have completed our work, we will forward our recommendations to the Committee and its members.

Generally speaking, NSPE is pleased with the direction that the Administration is taking with regard to transportation policy. Undoubtedly, transportation programs need this flexibility necessary to meet the many challenges that confront us with regard to transportation. An expenditure of more than $10 billion on an annual basis requires a considerable amount of "flexibility" if that money is to be spent effectively and efficiently.

GENERAL COMMENTS

Before commenting on the specific provisions of H.R. 10578, we would like to provide the Committee with several overall concerns of NSPE.

NSPE believes that the Nation's transportation system, probably the best in the world today, is at a crisis point. We are concerned that the tremendous investment in our highway system may not be as effective as contemplated unless programs are initiated to maintain the system.

The Nation's primary and secondary roads and major urban streets are in a state of serious neglect. Many Interstate system designs need major modernization. Major safety improvements, such as median barriers, longer merging lanes, and improved ramp design, just to mention a few, are sorely needed. Rural roads desperately need widening. Hazardous curves, fixed obstructions and dangerous grade crossings also need attention. Urban streets need better lighting, improvements of intersections, and more turning lanes. All roads and highways need better planning to allow for increased system capacity. Planning also needs to be improved if energy use is to be reduced. Unless there is a reduction of starting and stopping and excessive idling of vehicles, fuel reductions will not reach the optimum level. Better land use planning that improves travel patterns will also reduce fuel consumption.

NSPE strongly believes that proper use of engineering can improve the transportation system. Today's technology can address and solve the problems that now exist. We simply ask that the technology be applied. Private sector technology is available in sufficient quantities to solve planning, design and construction problems.

PLANNING

H.R. 10578 attempts to establish an integrated transportation planning system. The bill combines the highway and transit funds and apportions the money to states and metro planning agencies by formula. Also, it requires the Secretary of Transportation to review the transportation plans of large metropolitan areas.

NSPE recognizes the concerns expressed by states with the intrusion of a new entity—the large metropolitan area planning organization—into the planning process. We are not certain that Federal grants directed to that entity, bypassing state review, are advisable. Also, it is likely that a new layer of bureaucracy will only compound existing "red-tape" problems rather than eliminate them. NSPE is of the opinion that state officials should play a role in transportation planning and believes that direct funding of large metropolitan planning organizations will be a deterrent to this principle.

NSPE also questions the advisability of mandating that all large urban plans be reviewed by the Secretary. We are hesitant to support such Federal preemption of state activity. In addition, we are not at all sure that such a procedure may act as a bottleneck that will hold up good programs, rather than serve as an early warning device as envisioned by the Administration.

BRIDGES

NSPE is particularly concerned with the condition of this Nation's bridges. As this Subcommittee knows, this very serious problem is in need of immediate attention.

The Federal Highway Administration's 6th Annual Report to Congress on Bridge Replacement identifies 105,500 bridges that are either structurally deficient or functionally obsolete. Based on this, it has been established that at least $20 billion is needed to repair, replace, or rehabilitate these bridges.

Although the Administration recommends an increase in the bridge repair program of more than 100 percent and expands the bridge replacement and rehabilitation program, NSPE questions the sufficiency of the recommended funding. We believe that funding should be at a level that will eliminate the problem in a realistic period of time. Reportedly, it would take more than 40 years to remedy the bridge problem that exists today if the Administration's funding recommendation is accepted. We would hope that sufficient Federal-state funds would be available to complete the work in less than 40 years. Also, it should be remembered that bridges acceptable as safe today may need repair or replacement in the future.

INTERSTATE SYSTEM

NSPE applauds the Administration's effort to complete the Interstate highway system. When the system is completed it will have cost approximately $104 billion. In view of this vast expenditure, it is extremely important that the system be completed and kept in operating condition. Consequently, NSPE supports the effort to complete the system by 1990.

As this Subcommittee knows, over 90 percent of the Interstate system is now being used. Essential gaps in the system need to be closed to gain full use of the system. Proposals to transfer funds between states may be an answer. It seems inconsistent that states that have projects ready for construction are hindered, while money is waiting for action in other states. The borrowing of funds between states will accelerate the completion of the program. Also, borrowing from future years apportionments to begin work now may also serve the purpose well. Such a transfer of funding will also allow for expenditures in a more effective and efficient manner.

NSPE, as previously mentioned, strongly believes that the Interstate system needs to be maintained in operating condition. Consequently, we support the continuation of a separate program to provide for Interstate resurfacing, restoration and rehabilitation. We believe, however, that this program needs increased funding. Authorizations of $175 million annually are insufficient to bring the system up to an operating condition much less keep it there.

PRIMARY SYSTEM

NSPE questions the Administration's wisdom in consolidating many existing categorical programs affecting the primary highway system. Although the Administration assumes "consolidation" is the "mood" of the day, we are not sure that this is the proper course of action. Although flexibility is desirable and the Administration uses the concept of flexibility as the basis for its recommendation, NSPE believes that some very important programs, needing Federal assistance, may lose their identity if they are thrown into single pool. Congress previously determined that these programs needed special attention and we think it unwise to combine them at this time.

NSPE also notes that funds for several programs are shifted in H.R. 10578 from the General Fund to the Trust Fund. We are not sure that this shift of programs, totaling $430 million in fiscal year 1978, is a wise move. In our final report to the Committee, we expect to comment further on this recommendation. Also, we note that there is no funding recommended for forest roads and trails, parkways, and park roads and trails. These programs totaled $308 million in fiscal year 1978.

SAFETY

NSPE applauds the Administration's recommendation to provide funding for the purchase of truck weight scales. We believe that such a program will provide states with the necessary equipment to better enforce truck weight limitations. NSPE believes that the operation of big trucks on the highways directly relates to the deteriorating condition of the Nation's highways.

We urge the Committee to include funding for the manpower necessary to use the scales once they become available. If manpower is not available, the capital expenditure would have nil effect.

NSPE wishes to assure the Committee of our continued interest in the transportation problems of the Nation. We will forward to the Committee and to each member of the Committee our final recommendations when they are available.●

AN UNWELCOME PREDICTION: AUTOMOTIVE AIR POLLUTION TO RETURN

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to mention problems with the air environment at a time when there is only good news to report, but an article in the Sunday Washington Star reminded me of our certain future. With a slight change in the weather, we can expect the tons of emissions generated by our automobiles to be trapped and converted to harmful air pollutants.

As a southern California Congressman, I am very familiar with this process, and some of the necessary measures to reduce this health hazard. Unfortunately for everyone in the Washington area, the solutions to smog will not be adopted this year, and may not be adopted in the years to come. Since the manufacturers of automobiles succeeded in delaying the installaiton of effective pollution control standards until the 1980's, the burden of controlling automotive air pollution now falls on State and local governments, and individual auto users.

Mr. Speaker, since the Congress will be physically affected by this future wave of smog, and since we will undoubtedly be asked to intervene in some way or another again, I recommend this article to all my colleagues.

The article follows:

[From the Washington Star, May 28, 1978]

WHAT DOES THE SUMMER OF '78 HAVE IN STORE FOR KEY ELEMENTS OF LIFE? DESPITE EFFORTS, A WAVE OF AIR POLLUTION IS EXPECTED

(By Zofia Smardz)

Every summer the same thing happens.

Somewhere in Canada it starts. A mass of air forming into a high pressure system gets moving slowly, downward through Minnesota and eastward across the continent until it reaches the mid-Atlantic states—and the Washington metropolitan area.

There, usually, it stops.

And sits, in its naturally chosen spot, baking in the sun and the heat of the area's typical summer day.

Along its trip from the north country, the "cell," as the scientists call it, has picked up the pollutants lingering in the air on the way and carried them along with it to its resting place.

Where, every summer, the same thing happens.

Washington area motorists get into their cars in the morning, turn on the engines and spew endless hydrocarbons into the stagnant and already polluted air.

All day long, the emissions hang in the air and react with the sun, which transforms them into photochemical oxidants, the chief of which is ozone.

The result—air pollution, that awful smog, growing steadily worse as days pass and the weather stays the same. The air quality index worsens, alerts are called, and all over the city doors and windows are shut and air-conditioners turned on for relief from the dirty air.

People with respiratory problems have greater trouble breathing; people with allergies sneeze and cough more; and healthy people develop watery, itchy eyes and feel the invisible grime that settles on their hair and clothes.

It's getting to be an age-old story here, even though it's only been in the last decade that full attention has been drawn to the problem of air pollution.

Yet even that attention hasn't been enough to stir the kind of activity that will make a reduction in the area's disturbing pollution rate possible, most experts agree.

As a result, chances are good that the story will be virtually the same in the summer of '78.

"If summer is summer as we know it here, things will get bad," said Lucille van Ommering, a research assistant in the air resources program of the Metropolitan Washington Council of Governments who keeps records of the organization's air quality monitoring.

Down the line, the sentiments are echoed.

"It's going to get bad," declared John Koontz, special assistant to the director of environmental health in Prince George's County and gubernatorial representative to the National Capital Interstate Air Quality Planning Committee.

"Though the levels probably won't be any worse than last year, I think we'll have the same kind of problem," agreed Vernon Krause, manager of COG's air resources program. "I would say a great deal has not occurred to prevent the kinds of episodes we had last summer."

The "episodes" of last summer—six air pollution alerts lasting a total of 30 days, and 47 days when the air quality index exceeded 100 (the very unhealthy mark, according to COG)—made 1977 a record year for air pollution.

According to Environmental Protection Agency statistics, the Washington area is among the top 15 violators of the air quality standards set by the EPA. This means it exceeds the acceptable pollutant level of 0.8 parts per million (ppm) a good many times more than the allowable once a year.

In Washington, Krause said, the level has gone as high as .26 ppm in 1972, and .20 ppm last year.

The only factor that could make an absolute difference this year, most observers say, is also the only one that no one can make any different—the weather.

"If we could turn on a magic ventilation system at the end of every day in Washington, then there wouldn't be a problem," said Dr. Bailiss Walker, head of the D.C. Environmental Health Administration.

And nature's ventilation system has a way of bypassing Washington during the summer months. The storm path, along which the high winds that carry off the smog cloud travel, is displaced to the north of this area, "so we're out of the main track," said James Hand, air pollution meteorologist with the National Weather Service.

Meteorologists who are tired of being asked say there is no way of making an exact long-range prediction of Washington's summertime weather, but some periods of heat, humidity and slow-moving air can always be expected to descend. Overall summer predictions promise a hot one.

Given the impossibility of controlling the weather, the only other way to reduce and eventually eliminate the pollution problem is to control its sources.

And that, because of the nature of those sources, is a difficult thing to do.

"The thing to remember is that in terms of summertime air pollution, we are the culprits," said John Koontz. "It's not business, it's not industry, it's us, it's you and I.

"And because there are so many individual sources, it's harder to control."

Automobile traffic is generally recognized as the major contributor to air pollution in the metropolitan region. A change in auto traffic would certainly bring about a change in pollution patterns, but the results of two studies done by the D.C. Environmental Health Administration don't offer much hope of such change.

The studies, which Administrator Walker called "extensive," were aimed at determining what people knew about air pollution and whether they changed their behavior during periods of heavy smog and pollution alerts.

"We asked the subjects if they thought it was a health hazard, and nearly all said yes," Walker said. "But when we asked them if they stopped driving their cars or started taking Metro or car-pooled, they revealed that they continued to do what they always did—which was drive their cars."

Some official steps have been taken to encourage a cutback in auto usage and to reduce auto emissions, but they are limited and mostly long-range in aim, and their effect on the air pollution situation lying in wait in the months around the corner is expected to be minimal.

"Part of the problem is that everyone was sort of waiting to see what the requirements of the new Clean Air Act amendments would be," said COG's Krause. "Because the truth is, whenever new requirements come in, it means someone's going to have to suffer economically.

"Someone's going to have to spend money to change the way they do things, and everyone waited around to see who would be the one."

The 1977 amendments to the Clean Air Act call for state implementation plans, to be submitted to the EPA by Jan. 1, 1979, mapping out a strategy for attaining the air quality standards by 1982, or in some cases 1987. A large part of the Washington area strategy, Krause said, would be transportation planning.

But for today, the measures being implemented are small in both scale and effect.

In the District a vapor recovery system has been put into use at gasoline stations to prevent the escape of hydrocarbons into the air when people fill their gas tanks.

"I think people tend to forget the amount of hydrocarbons that are emitted by gasoline stations," Environmental Health Administrator Walker said. "This system provides for a level of reduction."

Walker said the District is now working on the second phase of the vapor program—the installation of devices to trap vapors when tank trucks empty their gasoline into gas station bulk vats. Such devices are already in use in both Virginia and Maryland.

But the vapor recovery system is still faulty and not as effective as it should be, according to James T. Alexander, regional engineer in the Falls Church office of the Virginia State Air Pollution Control Board.

"They're still having plenty of trouble with it in Los Angeles, where they've had it for four years," Alexander said.

The District's Walker said his department last fall did a survey of a small sample of 200 people that showed car-pooling is on the increase, and that express bus lanes across the 14th Street Bridge to I-395 have helped get more people to use buses.

"We're decongesting the downtown areas more rapidly," Walker said.

But the factor commonly cited as the great hope for the summer of '78 is the subway.

"The most significant thing that has changed since last year is the availability of Metro," said Eric Mendelsohn, chief of air pollution control for the Montgomery County Department of Environmental Services.

Metrorail, with its lines into Virginia and Silver Spring coaxing a substantial number of commuters out of their cars for the trek to and from work, is expected to have at least some slight effect on reducing pollution levels, though it may not be enough to be felt this year.

And bus feeder systems in the suburbs of Montgomery and Prince George's counties have been expanded to make the subway more accessible and encourage people to leave their cars at home.

"Metro is sure, over the long run, to change commuter transportation patterns and habits," said Prince George's Koontz. "In the District, at lunch hour alone, we've seen how it has changed patterns, with people from the Hill going to Connecticut Avenue for lunch and vice versa.

"Eventually, it will change patterns area-wide."

Koontz said the advent of Metro is being reflected in the Prince George's zoning process, where land use is being adapted to the availability of transportation systems in an effort to gear people's traveling habits to the use of mass transit.

"If the land use follows the subway, and people are able to walk to a transportation source, they'll begin to use it for more and more types of travel," said COG's Krause. "That will really ensure that the subway will have a major impact on air quality as it expands."

But short of a miracle from Metro, efforts to keep people out of their cars are not expected to be either highly successful or, where successful, particularly significant to the air problem.

Parking bans in areas of the city and the closer suburbs may cut down on car commuting, but the lack of reciprocal parking enforcement between Maryland, Virginia and the District gives free rein back where the bans have removed it.

"Scofflaws from out of state don't really feel threatened by getting parking tickets in the District because they can still get their cars registered in Maryland or Virginia," said James Alexander.

And the worst offender as far as parking goes, in the eyes of the air pollution people, is the federal government.

"The federal government gives away free parking to its employees, which encourages them to use their cars," said Alexander. He said this is at odds "with everything, including, the government's Metro subsidy, because it reduces Metro ridership."

Koontz agrees. "When the EPA moved into the Waterside Mall, they provided 4,000 free parking spaces for their employees," he said with a tinge of irony. "I think we're at the point in this country where the government ought to be able to recognize its own hypocrisy."

But the point everyone makes is that while the government bears a great amount of the responsibility—because only the government can force reduced automobile emissions or inspection of cars for their emission control devices, and only the government can subsidize Metro and charge for its parking spaces—just as much as the ultimate responsibility lies with the individual driver.

"The most important thing that needs to be done is to increase people's social conscience," said Dr. Patrick Gorman, chairman of the D.C. Medical Society's occupational and environmental health committee. "If people understand the hazards of air pollution better, they may finally participate actively in its prevention."

Because somewhere up in Canada, it's probably starting again.●

MY ROLE IN GOOD GOVERNMENT

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, recently I was pleased to have conducted a contest for high school seniors in the 26th Congressional District of New York on the subject of "My Role in Good Government."

Because of the intense interest shown in the writings of these students for their Government, it is my privilege to share with my colleague the thoughts expressed in the winning essay.

MY ROLE IN GOOD GOVERNMENT

(By Maxine E. Sarjeant)

Good Government is designed to assist the individual in becoming his best self—in reaching his fullest potential. Its purpose, too, is to aid each of us in the expression of our uniqueness.

Government, through its provision of public education, has allowed me to learn about (and from) people of varying cultures and experiences, in addition to developing a special interest in music. Both experiences should help me in my chosen field of engineering—at Howard University, Washington, D.C.—in the fall.

It is my impression that good government depends on participation. The most important action for any individual—be he teenager or senior citizen—is involvement. Obviously, voting is involvement but to me, there are other less obvious factors that may be more important to good government.

Participating and being involved means that one is active and to be active is to be:

1. Aware
2. Concerned
3. Tolerant
4. Informed
5. Vocal
6. Eager

I am aware that because of scandal and disappointment, government and school officials alike are losing support and fewer people are getting involved.

I am concerned that this is a vicious cycle which leaves the door open for even more scandal and disappointment.

I am tolerant and understanding of some human weaknesses and feel that with more public involvement and support, there is less chance of such things happening.

One of my main responsibilities is to be informed about issues, problems and differences around me.

I am vocal in that I do have opinions and I have taken positions, especially about matters arising in school. I also raise questions and attempt to seek out information needed to make intelligent decisions.

I am eager to see this system of involvement work!

All of us can gain!

All of us can profit!●

VOLUNTEER FORCE A SUCCESS

HON. WILLIAM A. STEIGER

OF WISCONSIN

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. STEIGER. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished columnist, Carl Rowan, had an excellent article in last night's Washington Star, "Volunteer Force a Success."

In his column, Rowan thoughtfully takes issue with those who have been critical of the volunteer army. His comments about the complaint that there are too many blacks in the Army today deserve special attention.

Rowan cites the excellent, but too-much-overlooked, study by Dr. Richard V. L. Cooper, director of defense manpower studies for the Rand Corp. Dr. Cooper found that the number of blacks meeting mental qualifications for military service has tripled in the last two decades, increasing the pool available for service.

"There is something galling about the fact that among those questioning the 'loyalty of blacks' in the volunteer Army, or the mental competence of 'poor white' volunteers, are affluent Americans who helped their sons avoid the draft, in peace and in war, and whose sons are not about to volunteer now," Rowan said. "There is a lot wrong with our defense posture, but we ought not make the all-volunteer concept the scapegoat—or make the race, economic status or level of sophistication of those who volunteer the bases for panic * * *.

"Let's tip our caps to the men and women who have volunteered—and go on to do the other things necessary to maintain a first-class military establishment."

The full text of the article follows:

"VOLUNTEER FORCE A SUCCESS"

(By Carl T. Rowan)

It would be a pity if Americans leaped to the conclusion that our all-volunteer military forces have become a haven for poor, mentally retarded misfits who would leave the country defenseless if the Soviet Union attacked.

We are being fed alarmist data by members of the House and Senate who find that they can ride this issue of "military unpreparedness" onto the nation's front pages.

Richard V. L. Cooper, director of defense manpower studies for the Rand Corp., testified before Sen. Sam Nunn's Armed Services subcommittee on manpower and personnel as to what he had found in 3½ years of studying the all-volunteer army.

"The volunteer force is a success and I think it is a viable option for the future," Cooper said, but he clearly was offering judgments that the Georgia Democrat and other senators did not want to accept.

Cooper assailed the notion that ending the draft was what doubled the percentage of blacks in the Army (now 26.4 percent of the enlisted men). He pointed out that whereas only 12 percent of young blacks met the mental qualifications for military service in the period from 1953 to 1957, 40 to 45 percent now meet the high qualifications. So the pool of available blacks has more than tripled.

Add to this the fact that while pay for enlisted personnel was raised substantially 18- and 19-year-old blacks were suffering unemployment at rates averaging 37.5 per cent in 1977 as against 13.5 per cent for white 18- and 19-year-olds, and it should be no surprise to anyone that blacks volunteer for military service more readily than whites.

But is this a sign of erosion of our forces?

Cooper told the Senate that "the increasing proportion of blacks in the force is not an indicator that the all-volunteer force has resulted in an army of the poor, as there are as many new recruits from middle- and high-income areas under the volunteer force as there were during the pre-lottery draft."

The Pentagon reports that in 1974, 1975 and 1976 (the last years of available records) a larger proportion of blacks entering the volunteer army had high school diplomas than was the case for white recruits.

Clearly, the all-volunteer army is not made up of black illiterates. Yet the whispers continue that the blacks: "Might be more loyal to race than to the U.S." "Maybe they wouldn't fight against Africans or other colored people." "How could we use a heavilyblack unit to put down rioting in a central city?" "The more blacks you have, the greater the chance of racial flareups."

Army Secretary Clifford Alexander and Army Chief of Staff Gen. Bernard W. Rogers reported in April that serious racial incidents "declined from a high of 64 in 1973 to 7 in 1975, 8 in 1976. As of Sept. 30, 1977 there had been 9 incidents."

There is something galling about the fact that among those questioning the "loyalty of blacks" in the volunteer Army, or the mental competence of "poor white" volunteers, are affluent Americans who helped their sons avoid the draft, in peace and in war, and whose sons are not about to volunteer now.

There clearly is a lot wrong with our defense posture, but we ought not make the all-volunteer concept the scapegoat—or make the race, economic status or level of sophistication of those who volunteer the bases for panic.

The greatest weakness may be that the people now organized to defend America are not those who have the most to defend. It was business executives in West Virginia, corporation bosses in Boston, the white collar elite in Hartford who expressed concern to me about the readiness of our military. But I got the feeling that, although their sons stand to inherit much of America, they were not about to volunteer to fight anywhere.

Let's tip our caps to the men and women who have volunteered—and go on to do the other things necessary to maintain a first class military establishment.●

ENERGY CONSERVATION AT THE LOCAL LEVEL

HON. SHIRLEY N. PETTIS

OF CALIFORNIA

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mrs. PETTIS. Mr. Speaker, the successful implementation of a national effort to conserve energy will require innovative and cost effective programs. It is for this reason that I would like to call to my colleagues' attention a project that was developed by the Community Services Department of San Bernardino County.

Through a series of filmed skits that have been shown in the San Bernardino County public schools, young students have been given a keen insight into energy conservation.

The project has truly been a community effort. Volunteers have been involved. San Bernardino State College and the University of Redlands have offered the needed technical assistance to put the skits on film. And the Southern California Edison Co. has contributed informational packets dealing with energy conservation.

Both teachers and students agree that this has been a positive training method that has stimulated an interest in conserving energy.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the staff of the San Bernardino County Community Services Department for their imaginative approach in making students aware of how they can help save energy.●

EXPLANATION OF VOTE ON H. RES. 1194

HON. W. HENSON MOORE

OF LOUISIANA

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, the Food for Peace program should not be used as a vehicle of convenience to force a foreign government to comply with a properly motivated directive for a foreign official to appear before a committee of Congress. Page seven of the report to accompany House Resolution 1194 states the $59.3 million in Food for Peace and Peace Corps funds programed for Korea during fiscal year 1979 would be jeopardized unless former Korean Ambassador Kim Dong Jo appears before the Korean investigation by the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct. This is the wrong means to achieve a proper goal.

On May 10 of this year during consideration of the First Concurrent Resolution on the Budget for fiscal year 1979 an amendment to deny Korea $56 million in Food for Peace funds was rejected by a 254 to 146 margin. I voted against the amendment and I find the renewed threat within House Resolution 1194 equally ill advised.

The Food for Peace program is aimed not at foreign governments, but rather to people in countries where food and fiber are not sufficient. Our farmers are paid in full for crops sent abroad under title I of this program and some of the crops involved for shipment to Korea are grown by Louisiana farmers. It is with their interest in mind that agriculture exports should be continued without undue interference.

Last year I voted to authorize the Korean investigation by supporting House Resolution 252 and I voted to encourage full disclosure by Korean officials by voting for House Resolution 868. I continue to support the Korean investigation and encourage full cooperation by the Korean Government. If it does not comply with our requests, attention should be given to cutting aid given directly to that government and not punish the people of Korea. Congress needs to find an appropriate mechanism to get full cooperation, but that goal will not be advanced by House Resolution 1194. For this reason, I voted against House Resolution 1194: ●

EIGHTH DISTRICT VFW SUPPORTS OBERSTAR BILL

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, I have spent a considerable amount of my time since I became a Member of this House working for a fair legislative solution to the controversy surrounding the Boundary Waters Canoe Area in my district.

I have worked with the people of my district to develop an environmentally sound management plan for the BWCA which does not ignore the rights of the people to use and enjoy the BWCA.

My plan, H.R. 12609, would preserve the BMCA's unique character as a wilderness area, prohibit logging and mining and would reduce the number of lakes open to motors by 25 percent.

Some of the strongest supporters of my efforts have been veterans and veterans groups. I would like to share with my colleagues an open letter, dated May 28, 1978, to the Members of this House and of the Senate from Mr. Frank Volk, VFW Commander for the Eighth District of Minnesota.

I found his letter to be one of the most eloquent expressions of support I have received from the veterans organizations.

The letter follows:

V.F.W. EIGHTH DISTRICT,
Ely, Minn., May 28, 1978.

DEAR SENATORS AND REPRESENTATIVES: As a veteran and commander of the eighth district, I am deeply concerned about the Boundary Waters area.

Many bills are being proposed which will affect the very district I represent, and the veterans in the entire country.

A great number of my comrades and myself feel that we are being discriminated against, since we are up in age and many veterans are disabled.

The veteran fought and served this country with honor to preserve freedom and rights. It appears now that some of the proposed bills make a mockery out of our having served.

Though many may not like to be reminded that had it not been for these very same veterans, there may not have been anything to preserve.

I sincerely encourage you to support the Oberstar Bill, which is the only bill that considers all, not just the few that are ablebodied and young.

Don't take our rights away; we earned them.

Sincerely,

FRANK J. VOLK.●

PUBLIC OPINION POLLS ON CONGRESSIONAL PUBLIC FINANCING

HON. JOHN B. ANDERSON

OF ILLINOIS

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to insert the latest Harris survey on campaign financing and to clarify the record regarding opinion research polls conducted on the issue of public financing of congressional campaigns.

The latest Harris survey indicates a strong concern about the large contributions given by political action committees. A large majority of individuals feel such special interest contributions have a bad influence on government and that the amount such groups can contribute to campaigns should be more severely limited.

While the public financing proposal which will soon be considered by the House does not lower the limit on interest group contributions, it does provide an incentive to attract small contributions. This type of fundraising is strongly supported by the people—nearly 80 percent of the Harris poll respondents indicated that money donated by small individual contributions has a good influence on government. The text of the Washington Post article on the survey follows:

BY 2-1, AMERICANS WOULD CUT ORGANIZED GIVING TO POLITICIANS

(By Louis Harris)

Americans are worried about political campaign contributions by both business and labor political action committees. By almost 2 to 1, they would favor reducing the amount that organized business, labor and consumer groups could give to a federal campaign from the current $5,000 limit to $2,500.

Under the present law, individuals are limited to a maximum $1,000 contribution to a presidential, Senate or congressional campaign. However, a business, labor or consumer group is allowed to give as much as $5,000 to any federal campaign. It is evident that the public feels the present disparity between organized and individual giving should be cut in half. Such a bill is now coming up in Congress and is likely to be voted on during this session.

Basically, Americans harbor rather deep suspicions about organized giving in politics. In almost every case in which the latest Harris Survey asked a national cross section of 1,563 adults about different types of political contributors, organized groups came up negatively:

By 65 to 21 percent, a majority feels that political contributions by big companies is a "bad influence on politics and government." Of course, corporations as such cannot give money to candidates on the national scene. However, when asked about "company political action funds contributed by certain employes and stockholders," a 47-to-32 percent plurality feels these also are a bad influence. It is evident that most Americans are very wary of any kind of corporate-related contributions to political campaigns.

However, by 58-to-26 percent, a sizable majority also believes that political contributions by labor unions have a "bad influence on politics and government." In the case of labor union political funds contributed by members of unions, a 46-to-36 percent plurality feels such contributions also have a bad influence.

There was one example of organized giving that was favorably regarded by the public:

By 55-to-26 percent, a majority feels that political contributions made by consumer action groups have a "good influence on politics and government."

The present gap between organized group giving and individual giving is felt to be "not justified" by a relatively close 44-to-38 percent plurality.

And when people were asked directly about specific organizations, the set of public opinion was clear.

By 50-to-27 percent, Americans favor reducing the maximum contribution of corporate political action committees from $5,000 to $2,500.

By an identical 50-to-27 percent the public supports the same reduction for labor union political action committees.

By 48-to-28 percent, it also favors limiting the contributions of consumerist political action groups to $2,500.

The latest Harris Survey also made clear just what kind of contributions people feel are healthy for the system:

By 79-to-10 percent, a sizable majority feels that money donated by "small individual contributors" has a good influence on the system.

By 54-to-30 percent, a sizable majority positive effect from contributions from "rich people who sincerely believe in a candidate and what he stands for." Whatever their feelings toward wealthy people, obviously most Americans would rather that well-heeled individuals give money to political campaigns than that organized business contributors do so.

In addition, I wish to caution Members against relying on an opinion poll conducted by Civic Service, Inc. This poll purports to indicate that a majority of Americans oppose congressional public financing. Let me point out that this survey and a similar one done in 1977 by the same organization directly conflict with questions asked by the two major pollsters. In March 1977, the Gallup poll asked:

It has been suggested the federal government provide a fixed amount of money for the election campaigns of candidates for Congress and that all private contributions from other sources be prohibited. Do you think this is a good idea or a poor idea?

57 percent good idea; 32 percent poor idea; and 11 percent no opinion.

In May of 1977, the Harris poll received a similar response to a similarly worded question:

President Carter has asked that some major changes be made in the federal election law. . . . Do you favor or oppose having all primary and general elections for the House of Representatives and U.S. Senate publicly financed as presidential primaries and elections are now financed?

49 percent favor; 28 percent oppose; and 23 percent not sure.

The reliability of the Harris and Gallup polls is excellent—they have predicted the outcome of all recent presidential elections with only small margins of error.

The Civic Service poll referred to earlier was commissioned by the American Medical Political Action Committee, a strong opponent of public financing. While their nonneutral position would not necessarily bias the results of the survey, an examination of their questions shows apparent flaws. For example, one of their statements attempting to measure support for public financing said:

Congressmen now make $57,000 plus a year. That's enough. We shouldn't have to pay for their campaigns, too.

Such a statement unfairly links congressional salaries with campaign financing—undoubtedly shifting resentment against the last congressional salary increase to the issue of public financing. Another statement contained similar bias:

It's been estimated that public financing of congressional campaigns would cost at least fifty million dollars just to start. Before we spend $50 million on congressional campaigns, there are many other priorities which need government attention and help.

It is no surprise to me that a large majority of the sample agreed with this question—certainly most individuals may feel a special program should have a higher priority than campaign financing. But in the total allocation of funds, I believe a majority of individuals would be supportive of public financing of campaigns.

Furthermore, an honest summary of the public financing proposal which the House will soon consider was never given to the survey population. Ideas such as the matching of small contributions, prohibiting excessive spending from a candidate's personal funds, and the voluntary nature of the system were not adequately explained in the questionnaire.

Not only do the questions fail to present some of the attractive reasons in support of public financing, they continually misrepresent the source of public financing funds. Instead of explaining that only revenues voluntarily designated by taxpayers may be used for public financing, the poll refers loosely to "public funds," "Federal money," or "tax dollars." Such an imprecise description only adds to the public's confusion and doubts about public financing.

The Civic Service survey indicates clearly that the majority of the people surveyed by this poll were not expressing their opposition to a system of matching of small contributions. When asked their conception of public financing, over 23 percent said public financing meant the Government pays the cost of campaigns using tax dollars, while only 8 percent felt it meant the Government matches with tax dollars the amount of money a candidate raises.

I ask my colleagues to examine closely the information they may receive regarding public financing. The matching proposal I support would increase public confidence in elections and in elected officials. It is a needed first step in restoring confidence in elections and government.●

HONORING DR. JAY SETTLE

HON. MARK W. HANNAFORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. HANNAFORD. Mr. Speaker, the Huntington Beach (California) Union

High School District is about to lose the valuable services of Dr. William "Jay" Settle, deputy superintendent. Dr. Settle has been an educator, athletic coach, and school administrator for 33 years, and his retirement on June 3 signals the end of an era for the Huntington Beach High School system.

Dr. Settle's career has seen him in many different roles and many different locales throughout Los Angeles and Orange Counties. He has been a vice-principal of three high schools, a principal of two, and has held various high-level administrative positions in several area school districts. Graduates of Wilson High School in Los Angeles will remember him for his skilled guidance through mathematics, science, and journalism courses. Others know him as an adept basketball coach and physical education teacher.

But Jay's record of volunteer community service is equally impressive. The Kiwanis Club, the Rotary Club, the Los Angeles and San Gabriel Community Chests, and UCLA's Project Upward Bound have all benefited from Dr. Settle's contributions of time and wisdom. The Los Angeles Urban League expressed its appreciation for his good works by granting him its Outstanding Citizen Award in 1967.

Mr. Speaker, the Settle family has every reason to be proud of the accomplishments of Dr. William Settle. And those who will be in attendance at the dinner in his honor will further bear witness to this man who is so willing to give of himself.

I wish him a happy and healthy retirement.●

A TRIBUTE TO MISS EVELYN POSTON

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, with great pleasure, I ask my colleagues today to join me in honoring Miss Evelyn Poston, a highly respected member of the community of San Lorenzo, Calif. She will soon be retiring after 47 long and dedicated years as a public servant for the San Lorenzo Unified School District.

Miss Poston has lived in California all her life. Not only were she and her seven brothers and sisters all born and raised in San Lorenzo, but also her mother was a native of this same community. In 1932, she was hired by the superintendent of the San Lorenzo Elementary Schools as his secretary/clerk and has been with the district ever since. It is amazing how she seems to know everyone and how everyone seems to know—and love—her.

The endless energy and enthusiasm which she put into her work served as an inspiration for students, parents, secretaries, clerks, custodians, teachers, and administrators. In addition, her concern for justice and equal treatment endeared her to the hearts of her community. With her dedication, the best possible educational program for the students of the San Lorenzo School District could be achieved.

The friends of Miss Evelyn Poston will be expressing their gratitude, affection, and appreciation at her retirement dinner on June 25. Looking at her record of past achievements, I know she will continue to serve as a model of excellence for her community. I am sure my colleagues agree she deserves the very best of luck in all her future endeavors.●

STATEMENT ABOUT WALTER R. MAY

HON. BO GINN

OF GEORGIA

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. GINN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to recognize 21 years of outstanding service to the Congress by Walter R. May, chief counsel of the Subcommittee on Investigations and Review of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation. Walt is retiring in the next few days and we shall certainly miss his influence and leadership.

A graduate of Boston University law school and a navy pilot during World War II, Walt served as a special agent, for the Federal Bureau of Investigation for 6 years. Following that, he was circulation director of the Boston Post.

He came to Capitol Hill in 1957 to work for the Senate Labor-Management Committee chaired by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas, John McClellan. Walt was the first assistant counsel added to the committee's investigative staff under the late Robert Kennedy.

Following creation of the Interstate Highway program in the mid-1950s, the authorizing Committee on Public Works and the leadership of the House of Representatives agreed that close supervision was necessary to maintain the public's confidence in that multibillion dollar program. The Special Subcommittee on the Federal-Aid Highway Program was created in 1959 and Walt May was named chief counsel and staff director. He has performed distinguished public service in that job ever since.

The investigations and revelations of that investigative body are legendary. The meticulous planning and field work that were characteristic of Walt's leadership led to disclosures and reforms too numerous to mention. Fraudulent right-of-way procurements, questionable construction practices, poor highway design, disregard for roadside safety by highway officials, these were just a few of the deficiencies exposed to congressional and public view.

Always there was the assurance that if Walt and his people had done the investigative work the evidence was overwhelming as to the legislative or administrative correctives that were recommended. He never mixed in partisan politics. His approach was to be thorough and unrelenting, but fair. This won him the respect of not only Members of Congress, but of the Federal, State, and local transportation officials who were sometimes the targets of his investigations.

As the mandate of the full Committee on Public Works and Transportation has been enlarged, the subcommittee's investigative and oversight function has expanded as well. Many of the provisions included in the 1977 amendments to the Clean Water Act, for example, originated in the lengthy investigations and hearings of the subcommittee.

Walts approach to the job has always been evenhanded and low key. His professional integrity has been unquestioned.

He has been a dedicated family man. In short, he has served well the country and the Congress.

I know that subcommittee members on both sides of the aisle, my predecessors as chairmen of the subcommittee, former Congressman John Blatnik of Minnesota and the distinguished majority leader of the House, JIM WRIGHT, share my high esteem of Walt May. All of us wish him well in his retirement and in whatever new endeavors he may pursue.●

HONORING GEORGE C. WILLIAMS

HON. MARK W. HANNAFORD

OF CALIFORNIA

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. HANNAFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to your attention the retirement of a distinguished educator and public servant, George Williams. Mr. Williams has been an elementary school principal in Huntington Beach, Calif., since 1962. He will be honored by those who know and love him at a dinner on June 4.

Mr. Williams' affiliation with the Ocean View school district began in 1961 when he launched his career in education as a teacher. In just 1 year, he demonstrated such outstanding abilities that he was selected principal of the Meadow View School, remaining in that capacity through 1971. He then was named principal of the Oak View School, the position that he holds today.

As a former college teacher in Long Beach, I have kept abreast of Mr. Williams' contributions to education. He has served on several college advisory commissions, including one concerned with consumer education and another that deals with problems of bilingual education. George has been a guest lecturer at two institutions of higher learning, the University of Southern California and California State University at San Diego. And he played a major advisory role in the establishment of educational—now public—television stations in Los Angeles and in Orange County.

Mr. Speaker, the Members of Congress assembled should also take note of Mr. Williams' military background. During World War II, George was promoted from private to captain and saw combat duty in Europe. Needless to say, he received several awards for his bravery. After retiring from active duty, he remained in the Army Reserves through 1963 and left with the rank of major.

Mr. Williams has been active in civic affairs as well. His efforts have assisted such worthwhile groups as the YMCA, the Kiwanis Club, the Red Cross, and the Buena Park Junior Chamber of Commerce. Currently, he is president of the Huntington Beach City Library Board.

It is indeed an honor for me to congratulate this notable public citizen. Mr. Speaker, I know you will join me in wishing him well.●

THE FUTURE OF DISARMAMENT: THE U.N. DISARMAMENT SESSION AND BEYOND

HON. JOHN CONYERS, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, the first world disarmament meeting in half a century is taking place at the United Nations this month. A few benchmarks identifying the sweeping changes in the military structure of the world ought to alert us to the fact that there is now an opportunity, which may not happen again, for the world community to curb the flow of weapons and stop the arms race:

The nations of the world this year will spend more than $400 billion on armaments, which comes out roughly to about $1 million each and every minute of the day;

The megatonnage of the world's nuclear arsenal is several million times the explosive force of the atomic bomb that destroyed Hiroshima;

By 1980 28 nations will possess a capability for producing nuclear weapons;

In 1965 only 13 countries had supersonic aircraft; today nearly 50 possess them.

The arms race and the proliferation of nuclear weapons are not easy issues to comprehend, let alone deal with. But we have no choice other than to deal with them.

Earl C. Ravenal has written an article on disarmament that enormously clarifies the issues before the U.N. disarmament session. Dr. Ravenal is a former official in the Office of the Secretary of Defense, author of several books on international relations, and a professor of foreign policy at Georgetown and Johns Hopkins Universities. His article, "Does Disarmament Have a Future," which appeared in the Nation on May 27, 1978, deserves serious reading.

The article follows:

DOES DISARMAMENT HAVE A FUTURE?

(By Earl C. Ravenal)

The arguments for disarmament are not bad. Nations—peoples—have an objective interest in a disarmed world, an interest they can't deny, or alienate, even by their negligent and irresponsible conduct. It is an especially urgent interest at this juncture, when we are living in a situation that strongly resembles the years before World War I: competitive armaments, regional antagonisms and irredentisms that give pretexts for aggression and conflict; unstable alliance systems opposing one another across still-tentative borders; profound social unrest and unmet domestic problems; the danger of mobilization and counter-mobilization, though now in the form of nuclear escalation. In such a climate, in 1914, "prudent" strategies of deterrence did not prevent war; they precipitated, accelerated, and expanded it.

Why have disarmament efforts failed? Why have they become objects of polite disdain in foreign policy-making circles, in the so-called "real world"? For this the peace people themselves are somewhat at fault. They persistently misconceived the problem of arms accumulation and war; they have fallen into the comforting habit of preaching to the converted. They still think that a reaffirmation of commitment, a redoubling of effort—perhaps in connection with an event such as the United Nations Special Session on Disarmament (UNSSOD)—will unlock the problem.

In anticipation of UNSSOD, we have harvested the expected crop of hopeful and right-minded proposals, mostly from the governments of smaller countries and nongovernmental groups. More significantly, we have intimations that the larger governments will seek some relative national advantage from the session, or deflect the sentiment it inspires by advancing minuscule or anodyne proposals, or diffuse its concrete initiatives in endless discussion and parliamentary maneuvering.

Actually, the follow-up to UNSSOD must be its most important phase. And, though the session is obviously intended to generate multilateral action, its most important products will be the independent intiatives of individual nations, and the pressures that domestic and transnational groups put on the leaders of such nations. If UNSSOD does not result in some concrete national actions, it will have been just another rhetorical feast, followed by the usual international hangover and the usual bromides.

A bibliography on arms control and disarmament, currently on sale, lists more than 9,000 entries—analyses, discussions, appeals, polemics and blueprints. Whatever is wrong with disarmament, it is not a shortage of proposals. If the political prospects for disarmament now are poor, there are intellectual reasons: the logical basis for disarmament is not clear; past rationales are out of touch with current international circumstances; they have been overtaken by technology. What are some of the specific problems?

Comparative Utopias. Disarmament proposals have relied abjectly on the assumption of a universal international organization—virtually a world government—that would subordinate national governments and dispose of central military forces. Architects of disarmament proposals have spent much of their time detailing frameworks for global collective decision making, provisions for the transfer of military power by states to international authority, and blueprints for world police forces.

The fault has been to underestimate the stubborn longevity of the nation-state. True, most of them are porous as sieves, and incompetent, but they will be the source of foreign policy decision making for the foreseeable future.

This need not be an occasion for despair. Impressive measures of peace have been achieved by independent states. Nations have negotiated stringent limits on arms, and have actually destroyed considerable stores of their own major military equipment (viz., the Washington Naval Treaties of 1922 that liimted the battleships of the five great naval powers). They have also devised serious restraints on the conduct of war (viz., The Hague conferences at the turn of the century, and the Geneva Conventions between the World Wars). Nations have even agreed to outlaw war entirely as an instrument of policy, as in the Treaty of Paris (the "Kellogg-Briand Treaty") of 1928. And nations for long periods of time have had very low levels of armaments—from one-tenth to one-twentieth of what they maintain now.

Nor does the persistence of national sovereignty mean giving up on "general and complete disarmament." On the contrary, it should be seen as a reason for accomplishing the partial steps of arms control, and as a standard against which each such move can be measured. The high-water mark of general and complete disarmament is the September 1961 McCloy-Zorin "Joint Statement of Agreed Principles" and the 1962 draft treaties by the United States and the Soviet Union. These statements are useful precedents, evidence of an underlying will of nations to countenance comprehensive disarmament, and even a glimpse of its technical feasibility. On the other hand, they must be seen as largely hypothetical schemes of no real strategic intent—a warning to contemporary disarmament strategists that a simple return to the formulas of sixteen years ago could mean another exercise in finely crafted illusions. McCloy-Zorin and the U.S.-Soviet draft treaties, with their initial promise and their exemplary faults, should be taken as points of departure.

The principal problem with the 1961–62 drafts is that they posit as the final stage of disarmament the virtually complete dismantling of military forces, weapons and defense budgets. At the end of this process, a supra-national U.N. agency is to be the sole remaining repository of forces and weapons that could be used for more than internal defense. An appropriate agreement for our day, one more skeptical of achieving world government, would have to allow correspondingly higher residual forces and a more permissive definition of "internal order," "safeguarding of frontiers" and other tasks. In the probable circumstances of the future, disarmament would be pursued down to forces that could not feasibly conduct aggressive war against other nations, but that would allow nations to defend their citizens and their property against external attack.

A Grain of Salt. A second flaw in past disarmament proposals is that they have assumed that progress will come only through mutilateral or bilateral bargaining and formal agreements among nations. The emphasis has been on draftsmanship and legalism. This ignores the potential of independent, national, informal moves to disarm and to defuse war. Indeed, in many important areas of disarmament, the only effective moves might be independent. Peace doesn't have to be formal, binding, comprehensive, or neat. It can be achieved in patches, wherever and however possible.

We should adopt a multilevel approach, including multilateral, bilateral, national and transnational forums and measures. Multilateral forums can be ones such as the U.N. Special Session. Partial multilateral conferences and organizations, such as the "club" of nuclear powers, or the suppliers of nuclear facilities and technology, or the countries of a region, can also contribute.

Bilateral negotiations such as SALT should also be supported, but we shouldn't put all our eggs in that basket. We are not likely, in the next few rounds of SALT, to exact from the Soviet Union sufficient cuts in their arsenal of heavy, increasingly accurate, MIRV intercontinental ballistic missiles (their SS–18s) to protect our own fixed land-based missiles (Minuteman). And the Russians, for their part, will be unable to reverse the formidable U.S. capability for counterforce strikes. We need to hedge against the insufficiency of the SALT negotiations by making certain independent moves that are within our own competence, such as phasing out our land-based missiles as they become vulnerable to advances in Soviet weaponry.

Transitional, nongovernmental institutions, such as professional associations and religious groups, will be needed, to prepare a receptive climate for serious reductions and other initiatives, and to put restraints on national governments. In addition to working in all such forums, we must be active in all the weapons areas: strategic nuclear weapons, tactical nuclear weapons, "peaceful" nuclear technolgy, conventional arms and arms transfers, including instruments of repression.

Finally, we must control warlike activity in all ways available: quantitative limits on numbers of weapons or total explosive power; qualitative restrictions on weapons systems and on research, development and testing, nonproliferation safeguards such as inspection and monitoring of nuclear materials and facilities; geographical restrictions such as nuclear-weapon-free zones or general zones of peace; limits on military budgets; doctrinal changes (for example, no first use of nuclear weapons, and limitations on targeting and other attempts to spare noncombatants); legal strictures that reinforce personal accountability and help alter attitudes toward military actions and preparations.

Playing the Numbers Game. Past disarmament proposals have been preoccupied with the numbers of warheads, delivery vehicles and other manifestations of military power. It is often assumed that numbers in themselves cause instability and war. (This is a curious mirror-image of the hawks, who think that numbers win or lost wars.) All of it ignores the question: how do wars start? Would any nation be crazy enough to start a nuclear war? Only if it thought the other side was about to strike first—and if it thought it could prevent the other side from striking first.

Therefore, people ought to take more interest in the stability of the strategic balance, and in the context of that balance nations, and ultimately peoples, must have incentives to disarm. At least, at all stages, they must be spared overwhelming fears for their own security. Each stage of disarmament must be more secure than the situation that would otherwise prevail.

Looking for the Gordian Knot. Most previous disarmament efforts have stressed trust and good will, as if those are the primary—or even the only—factors that have been lacking. They seek to cut some Gordian knot with an immediate and comprehensible stroke of exhortation. But trust and good will are not enough. Trust must be founded on the technical and logical conditions of strategic stability. In a nuclear age, strategic stability is almost synonymous with peace.

Therefore, the peace people have to be as expert as the hawks; they must be able to hold their ground in debates that turn on technical characteristics and effects of weapons. It is new technology that has made the nuclear balance brittle again, and brought calculations of counterforce into fashion. For a decade and a half, in a situation now castigated by many as "Mutual Assured Destruction," there was effective mutual vulnerability. With dispersed single-warhead missiles on each side, and with relatively low accuracies, combined with relatively small throw weights and yields, the advantage lay with the defender, or the retaliator. An aggressor could lose by starting a nuclear war (in a sense even more obvious than the fact that "no one wins"). Now, with MIRVs and with more precise accuracies, greater throw weights and higher yields, the advantage has reverted to the attacker, and first counterforce strikes are again at least thinkable. Therefore, tangible corrections will be required—reductions and changes in weapons and force structures, not just expressions of good will.

Misplacing the problem leads to misconceiving the answer. Many peace people are quick to cry "pathology" or "malevolence," and some day, no doubt, the present accumulation and use of arms will be regarded as madness. But it is madness of a very special kind. It has to do with the convoluted, but genuine, quest for "national security." Therefore, "curing" individuals, even if this were possible, would not be an effective remedy. Disarmament proposals must treat "national security" as a real problem, not an aberration.

Something for Everybody. Previous proposals for disarmament have been self-deluding about their effects. They assumed that disarmament would bring all good things in its train—peace, order, justice and prosperity. These expectations are nice, but soft. When reasonable predictions demonstrate that it can't all come true, the whole case fails. Some realism at the start would be more helpful. Disarmament is worth the costs, but there will be some. For example, the restraint of nuclear weapons by some nations (particularly the principal "guarantor" nations) may encourage the proliferation of nuclear arms throughout the international system. Restraints on transfers of conventional arms may lead to the development of national arms production capabilities. Abolition of the "alliance system" may lead to the acquisition by other nations of independent means of defense—to a "Gaullist world." The United States may lose its influence on other nations and have to resign itself to accepting other regimes, the bad along with the good, forfeiting even the ability to bring about "justice" by intrusion or coercion.

In making the case for disarmament, peace people must be tough-minded and responsible. But "tough-minded" has nothing to do with the attitude of the hawks; it means being honest about the trade-offs and the balance of risks. And "responsible" has nothing to do with the compromised and stultified positions of the foreign policy establishment; it means accepting the consequences of our own proposals.

Ranging over the array of disarmament initiatives, one sees that most of them can be made independently, by the United States alone, even if it would be preferable to achieve reciprocity from other significant powers such as the Soviet Union.

Independent national initiatives are widely misunderstood and somewhat distrusted, but they have an important, and at times critical, function. They are designed to reduce the risks and burdens of military postures and doctrines. They can create momentum for the disarmament process and indicate the scope of possibilities. They can generate public and even elite support, transforming the climate in which disarmament might proceed. The insistence on independent moves within a framework of comprehensive disarmament is not a contradiction but a recognition of reality and actually an unconditional commitment to progress in arms reduction and war avoidance.

Eliminate the Counterforce Threat. One way that the United States could begin to reduce its forces independently, and in the process enhance its own security and the stability of the strategic balance, would be to phase out our intercontinental ballistic missiles. Anyone who understands the technical factors—types of weapons, their location, their characteristics and effects—must take seriously the contention of the hawks that certain portions of our nuclear forces will become vulnerable, by the early to mid-1980s, to a Russian first strike. SALT II—or any probable SALT III or IV—will not solve the problem. What can we do about it? Independently, without asking or being asked by the Russians, we could (1) eliminate our own provocative counterforce capability, (2) eliminate our vulnerability to a Soviet counterforce strike.

Our own counterforce capability rests heavily on the potent (350 kiloton) MK–12A warhead and the superaccurate (within one-tenth of a mile) NS–20 guidance system that we are already introducing into our Minuteman force. These two improvements, fitted onto the present 550 Minuteman II missiles, could threaten Soviet missiles in their silos, thereby needling the Russians in a crisis to launch their missiles pre-emptively. Their decision to do so would be reinforced by the fact that our improved Minuteman would still be a stationary target; in short, our land-based force would have the worst combination of characteristics: provocation and vulnerability.

As for vulnerability, some propose to eliminate it by moving to the M–X system—that is, putting our missiles in a big subway system, moving them back and forth in 20-mile tunnels. And indeed, mobility is the least objectionable feature of the proposed M–X system. The arguments against "going mobile" with M–X are its extreme cost (estimated at close to $50 million to deploy about 300 missiles); its provocative and destabilizing effects because of its high MIRV-carrying capability (up to fourteen warheads); the relatively high yield of each warhead (about 200 kilotons), and their projected accuracy (within 100 yards); the fact that the M–X, even in its mobile or multiple basing mode, would still be vulnerable to a high expenditure of Soviet warheads; and, not least, the fact that there is an obvious alternative—the complete elimination of our land-based missile force, over the next five or ten years, as it becomes vulnerable to improvements in the Soviet missile force.

Some would say that we should use this weapons system (and indeed every item of our defense policy) as a bargaining chip against the Russians. But should our entire defense policy depend on how the Russians feel about it? Independent moves should be more than bargaining ploys, so much psychological bait, to be canceled if not reciprocated. They should make strategic sense in themselves, so that they can be sustained whether or not they are reciprocated. In the most general sense, the purpose of independent national moves is to disconnect our security from "the Soviet threat."

No First Use of Nuclear Weapons. Perhaps the most important move toward a less dangerous world is for nations to build into their defensive plans an intention not to use nuclear weapons first. President Carter's address to the U.N. on October 4, 1977, was no change from our traditional doctrine. We are still relying on a nuclear response to redeem a losing conventional battle. Our present policy is a prescription for converting regional defense into global holocaust.

We should move to a doctrine of no first use, even independently and unconditionally, because it would enhance our own security and the stability of the world strategic balance. Our homeland, cities, population, property, political system, civil arrangements, social structures—everything we have—can be destroyed only if we invite an enemy's direct attack. We have every strategic, as well as moral, reason to adopt a no first-use doctrine.

"Tac Nucs" and Neutrons. Tactical nuclear weapons also ought to be subject to some independent national initiatives. Employed within a "theatre," such as Western Europe, and generally on or relatively close to the battlefield, they present a special problem in the prevention of war. Although ostensibly designed for attack on military objectives, they are a bridge between conventional warfare and intercontinental strategic nuclear weapons and thus open up the possibility of global conflict.

Many aspects of tactical nuclear weapons arise in the debate about the introduction of the "neutron bomb" into the U.S. arsenal in Europe. A device that kills by enhanced radiation, rather than blast or heat, it is said to be particularly effective against tanks and armored personnel vehicles. Since, unlike other tactical nuclear weapons, its radiation is massive but short-lived, enemy areas attacked with the neutron bomb or shell would soon be available for occupation.

The danger is not that this weapon won't do what it is supposed to do; rather, that it might do it too well. If we were already in a conventional war, our own initial use of these nuclear weapons would be more than probable, leading almost inevitably to all-out nuclear warfare. Further development and deployment of the neutron weapon should be canceled, but it is typical of the "improvements" of tactical nuclear weapons that will constantly be sought as long as this category of arms is relied on to fill a "gap" in the spectrum of warfare and deterrence. We should grasp the larger problem of tactical nuclear weapons and consider their elimination from all theatres, including Europe, and ultimately from our stockpiles as part of a more general phased program of disarmament.

Other Independent Moves. Several other areas of disarmament lend themselves to independent national initiatives. Pending a comprehensive ban on nuclear testing, we could impose upon ourselves an indefinite moratorium. We now have a significant lead in the aspects of nuclear technology that are proved in such tests. We also have enough lead in the flight testing of improved missiles to declare an independent moratorium on that activity. Bilateral reciprocity might or might not ensue, but we would lose little, if anything, by the effort.

Still another independent move would be for the United States to observe nuclear-weapon-free zones or, more broadly, zones of peace established by regional nations, such as the nuclear-weapon-free zone declared for Latin America in the Treaty of Tlatelolco in 1967, or the zone of peace proposed for the Indian Ocean.

We could also impose more rigid standards of war crimes upon our own leaders. There will be no lasting progress in curtailing war until responsibility is fixed at the level of the genesis of all human action: the will and conscience of the individual person. Emphasis on strict morality and legal responsibility would revoke the Niebuhrian double standard that postulates one realm for the individual (traditional Christian morality) and another for the statesman (an amoral world). The consequences of this two-tier ethic have been undeclared wars, covert political actions, assassinations, destabilizations of lawful and popular regimes, secrecy in government, deception of citizens, and arrogation of war powers by the Executive.

Areas Not Amenable to Independent Initiatives. Some measures—particularly mechanisms for confidence building and peace keeping—are hardly susceptible to independent national actions. Vital as they are to a scheme of disarmament, they require multilateral agencies, such as the United Nations or at least regional groupings. Peace keeping is one of the conditions for inducing the disarmament of the larger powers and the dismantling of the opposing military alliance systems. The present "guarantors" must have the assurance that a local conflict will be contained short of the point where they would "have to" become involved.

The Special Problem of Proliferation. The spread of nuclear weapons, nuclear materials and conventional arms is not so much an area of clear opportunity for disarmament as it is an embarrassing, even a poignant, trade-off against measures of disarmament that would otherwise be indisputably desirable. We have to recognize nuclear proliferation not as a technical problem in itself but as an aspect of the emerging many-power world. Indeed, the tendency to fragmentation of military power and political initiative has been exacerbated by the decline of American reliability, both as an alliance guarantor and as a supplier of critical resources, in this case nuclear fuel. Thus, further steps to curtail American power through disarmament might, as a side effect, contribute to further nuclear proliferation. This will be true despite any countervailing exemplary effect of American self-restraint in the development of nuclear arms and nuclear energy.

Nevertheless, things can be done, some independently, some cooperatively, to impede the process. Some examples: developing restrictions within the London Supplier Group on the transfer of nuclear technology, strengthening the inspection and monitoring powers of the International Atomic Energy Agency, and inventing improvements in the nuclear fuel cycle.

Disarmament, however substantial, is not an end in itself. It must be shaped by a larger vision of security. For thirty years the United States has operated under a national security theory that can be described in two key terms: deterrence and alliance. Unless it is fundamentally altered, we are condemned to periodic exercises of "brinkmanship" (credibility-enhancing confrontations), such as Cuba in 1962 and the Middle East in 1973; to periodic "limited wars," such as Korea and Vietnam, and to the hovering threat of global nuclear confrontation. It has been said that "deterrence works." It works, that is, until it fails. And then, because of the exaggerated retaliatory postures that have been adopted by both sides "to strengthen deterrence," destruction is vastly aggravated. And alliances serve as transmission belts and amplifiers of regional conflict. The cult of deterrence and the alliance system should, therefore, be replaced with a counter-theory of war avoidance and self-reliance.

Such a fundamentally altered foreign policy need not proceed from the premise that the "other side" is up to nothing. It may be true that other nations are doing things that are not altogether benign. If we admit the probability of some troublesome behavior by others, and still want to obtain the benefits of a revised security system, we may have to ask some more basic questions. They will be "so-what" questions, "can-we-live-with-that" questions. To answer them, we will have to overturn some notions that have been considered almost self-evident, such as the value of a military balance—not whether we are currently enjoying such a balance but whether we need a military balance at all. Finite strategic sufficiency, at each stage of disarmament, is a valid and respectable condition; but the quest for balance is more likely to result in unending competition and, paradoxically, to perpetual instability.

We will also have to ask, not what "security" means but rather whose security is at stake. There can be no "national security"—or "national interest," for that matter—apart from the security and the increases of a nation's citizens. We need a concept of "civil security." The "we" that is traditionally invoked by elites must be taken apart, and the real consensus must be found. True, the public gives off confusing signals, but by and large, if faced with a stark choice, citizens don't want to risk being consumed in a nuclear fireball or poisoned by radioactive debris in order to enhance their government's influence on the conduct of other nations.

"Realism" and "responsibility" are words, bandied about with some emotion in the current debate on national security. A disarmament program such as that proposed here is intended to be appropriate to the conditions of a future international system, and to make those conditions more favorable to the continuation of human life and civilization. Such a program would seem to be realistic, in the most precise as well as the most fundamental sense. Nevertheless, the very proposal of substantial disarmament is so far from the present agenda of the principal nation that it courts charges of extremism, irresponsibility, and fantasy.

But there is such a thing as the extremism of the Center, the ultimate irresponsibility of the sober elites. All too commonly it is said that the circumstances of the nuclear age have discredited the civilized values that have evolved over centuries. But those are the values that lead to survival, and the "statesmanship" that has been developed to suit a nuclear age has been precisely contrary to the probability of survival in a nuclear age. When putting forth proposals for disarmament we must not neglect the "risks." But there is a choice of risks, and we should not be afraid to make our commitments and investments on the side of peace.●

APARTMENT HUNTING, IN BLACK AND WHITE

HON. BILL FRENZEL

OF MINNESOTA

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, a full decade after Congress passed comprehensive open-housing legislation, it is clear that ineffective enforcement has allowed discrimination in this country to persist. In the following letter, which appeared in the New York Times yesterday our distinguished colleague, JOHN ANDERSON, forcefully and eloquently states the need to press on in our work to obtain justice for victims of discrimination—work only just begun by the President's Reorganization Plan No. 1.

I am pleased to note the constructive efforts of our colleagues, JOEL PRITCHARD and CALDWELL BUTLER to make our civil rights enforcement system worthy of our important civil rights laws.

The letter follows:

[From the New York Times, May 30, 1978]

HOUSING: APARTHEID, AMERICAN STYLE

To the Editor:

James L. Hecht's May 11 Op-Ed article, "Apartment Hunting, in Black and White," should shock the sensibilities of every American. A survey of 40 cities around the nation financed by the Department of Housing and Urban Development, indicates that—even if, as the author claimed, the problem is somewhat understated in the report—"only one out of four blacks is given the same choice as a white person when seeking an apartment."

Ten years ago, after a considerable amount of agonizing, Congress passed an ambitious Federal open-housing bill with sanctions against anyone who refuses to rent or sell property to another person because of race, color or creed. Indeed, one of the most critical votes during the bill's progress through the Congress occurred in the House Committee on Rules on April 9, 1968, ironically the morning that, the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. was being buried in Atlanta.

In those troubled times, many of us in Congress were struggling with the fundamental realities of racial segregation and trying to chart the strength and breadth of the Federal response. For my part, I had come to the conclusion that we could no longer tolerate segregation and separatism and that it was incumbent upon us to become, as my early training had instructed, "agents of reconciliation."

But for all the good intentions invested in that landmark housing bill that we labored over on the eve of the calamitous summer of 1968, the H.U.D. study tells us that little has happened in the decade since Dr. King's death to ease the degrading plight of black Americans looking for decent housing for themselves and their families. Racial segregation in housing is a tragic, unrectified fact of life in the United States, an American brand, yes, of apartheid—no less immoral and onerous for being de facto rather than de jure separatism.

Yet it need not be so. As Mr. Hecht pointed out, concerted action by the Federal Government can result in measurable, meaningful progress for those who suffer discrimination from real estate brokers, home owners, mortgage lenders and landlords: "The case for stronger government action against those who violate fair housing laws is supported by the progress that has occurred when there have been modest efforts at enforcement."

And that is just what is being developed in the House of Representatives today. A group of Republicans led by Representatives Joel Pritchard (R.-Wash.) and Caldwell Butler (R.-Va.) is drafting a sequel to our earlier proposal, the Civil Rights Act of 1977, which, like its predecessor, will make more uniform and more efficient the coverage provided by existing civil rights laws.

Civil rights responsibilities, which are now thinly spread over more than two dozen government agencies and offices, and which are enmeshed in a maze of more than 50 existing statutes, would be codified and assigned to several centralized authorities. In those cases where all efforts at voluntary compliance have failed, the legislation would provide a single kind of ultimate sanction by granting the injunctive relief necessary to eradicate the current discriminatory practices and the effects of past practices, and to forestall future abuses. Clearly, expedited procedures for the investigation and resolution of complaints are critical to the success of any Federal anti-discrimination program, as is borne out by the findings of the H.U.D. study.

If we have learned only one lesson from the shortcomings of the 1968 act, let it be this: Powerful incentives are needed if we are to end housing discrimination in our country. Surely everyone should agree that we all have a right to live where we choose—that the color of one's skin should be of as little consequence as the color of one's house.

VICE ADM. ROBERT IRA PRICE

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, the safety of oceanborne traffic is of very special importance to southern California. It is of even greater importance to the 32d Congressional District, where the twin ports of Long Beach and Los Angeles combine to form one of the busiest harbor complexes in the world.

Thus, the 11th Coast Guard District is a highly visible entity in our area. Under the highly professional and able leadership of its Commander, Rear Adm. Robert I. Price, the Coast Guard has improved on its already commendable reputation in our area. Therefore, it will be with mixed feelings that the maritime community will view his promotion to vice admiral and transfer to his new assignment as Commander of the 3d Coast Guard District/Atlantic Area in the Port of New York. We are pleased to see his excellent record and qualifications recognized by this promotion, but at the same time we will miss his leadership back in California.

Born in New York City on September 22, 1921, Robert Ira Price graduated with a bachelor of science degree from the U.S. Coast Guard Academy on June 6, 1945. Ensign Price's first assignment was aboard the destroyer escort U.S.S. Pettit in the South Pacific as a deck watch officer.

On the Coast Guard icebreaker Northwind as navigator and first lieutenant from 1946 to 1949, Admiral Price served on polar cruises to Alaska, the Canadian arctic, Greenland, and the Antarctic. He was selected for a 3-year course in naval architecture at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology after qualifying for engineering duty with the cutters Tampa and Unimak, graduating in 1953 with the professional degree of naval engineer.

In 1955, after service at the Coast Guard yard and at sea as engineer and executive officer, Bob Price reported for duty at headquarters in the Merchant Marine Technical Division. He served as technical secretary to the U.S. Delegation to the International Safety of Life at Sea Conference in 1959, which was called in response to the sinking of the Andrea Doria.

After commanding the Coast Guard cutter Nemisis in the Gulf of Mexico for 2 years, Admiral Price returned to Coast Guard Headquarters, Office of Merchant Marine Safety. He was awarded the Legion of Merit for meritorious achievement in improving the international shipboard fire safety standards following the Yarmouth Castle disaster. While Chief, Planning and Special Projects Staff, he received the Coast Guard Commendation Medal for preparing a report to Congress in 1970 on control of hazardous polluting substances.

In addition to other duties between 1962 and 1971, Admiral Price served as U.S. Representative for the State Department in the technical work of the Intergovernmental Maritime Consultive Organization, an agency of the United Nations. He received a Meritorious Service Medal in July 1973 for his performance as Captain of the Port of Philadelphia, and in 1974 was promoted to rear admiral and assumed the post of Chief, Office of Marine Environment and Systems.

Rear Admiral Price assumed command of the 11th Coast Guard District, Long Beach, Calif., in June 1976. His presence in our area has been of immense value not only to the maritime industry, but to all of us who live or work in the Los Angeles-Long Beach Harbor area. His leadership in the field of martime safety has been outstanding. Under his direction, the oil spill contingency plan for the ports was reorganized, and now serves as a model for all other Coast Guard districts. The high level of readiness instilled by Admiral Price was amply demonstrated in the prompt response by the Coast Guard to the explosion of the tanker Sansinema in December 1976.

As a prime mover in our area's awareness of marine safety, Admiral Price worked extensively on the safe handling of hazardous cargo, including the safety factors of transporting liquefied natural gas.

Despite his busy schedule, Bob Price found time to become involved in community affairs. He was active with the Long Beach Chamber of Commerce's military affairs committee, the Long Beach Rotary Club, the Propeller Club, and the National Defense Transportation Association. In addition, he is a member of the Society of Naval Architects and Marine Engineers, and was elected a fellow of the Royal Institution of Naval Architects of London in 1972 for his contributions to international maritime safety and antipollution standards.

Mr. Speaker, my wife, Lee, joins me in congratulating Rear Adm. Robert I. Price as he is promoted to vice admiral, and in wishing him the best of success as he assumes command in New York. His leadership and expertise in the field of maritime safety will be missed by all of us in southern California; but the benefits he will leave us can serve as a reminder of his outstanding service in our area.

We would also like to extend our best wishes to Admiral Price's lovely wife, Virginia, and their two daughters, Mrs. Andrea Stevens, M.D., and Mrs. Keven V. Chriss.●

BERGER ATTACKS RESULT-ORIENTED JURISPRUDENCE

HON. JOHN M. MURPHY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, in government by judiciary, Raoul Berger, the eminent constitutional scholar of Harvard University, concluded that in recent years many of our courts have been rewriting, rather than defending, the Constitution. Subsequent to the publication of his important book, and not surprisingly, Berger has been the target of criticism from many who are connected with the Nation's courts. Writing in the April 14 edition of National Review, Professor Berger has answered his detractors and eloquently defended his thesis that the courts have sometimes been instruments of social revolution through the legal process.

The most recent instance of the courts' result-oriented jurisprudence concerns an issue upon which Professor Berger spoke forcefully and well—the exclusive nature of article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the U.S. Constitution. When Professor Berger appeared before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and other congressional committees in the last year, he deplored as a gross extension of Executive power the attempt to dispose of the Canal Zone and U.S. property therein by treaty alone. But the Supreme Court, by its announcement on May 15 of denial of the petition for writ of certiorari in the case of Edwards against Carter, has not stopped this Executive encroachment. The Court allowed to stand a tenuous majority opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. That opinion sought to explain away the plain language of the Constitution. I believe that despite the Supreme Court's refusal to entertain the Edwards case, Members of the House will not lose sight of the need to retain one of the most fundamental rights of the Congress in the separation of powers doctrine—the right to act in the disposal of U.S. property and territory.

The House cannot allow the principles of the Constitution to be eroded because of the tactics designed to gain approval of the new Panama Canal Treaty arrangement. As I have stated many times, the powers of the House are at stake and their retention transcends the Panama Canal treaties.

Although the social and political equity involved in some of the important decisions discussed by Professor Berger must never be reversed, Berger's exposition of the encroachment by the Executive and judiciary upon the powers of the Congress is an important contribution.

For the information of my colleagues, the article, "Academe vs. the Founding Fathers," follows:

[From the National Review, April 14, 1978]

ACADEME VS. THE FOUNDING FATHERS

(By Professor Raoul Berger)

"The most immediate constitutional crisis of our present time," wrote Professor Philip Kurland, is "the usurpation by the Judiciary of general governmental powers on the pretext that its authority derives from the Fourteenth Amendment." Almost fifty years earlier, Justice Holmes expressed the "more than anxiety" he felt because, "As the decisions now stand, I see hardly any limit but the sky to the invalidation of [the constitutional rights of the states] if they happen to strike a majority of this Court for any reason as undesirable. I cannot believe that the amendment was intended to give us carte blanche to embody our economic or moral beliefs in its prohibitions." Time and again Justice Black inveighed against the Court's unconstitutional exercise of the amending power, as did Justice Harlan. My Government by Judiciary: The Transformation of the Fourteenth Amendment assembled the evidence that undergirds such views, and demonstrated that the Court has exercised a revisory power that the Constitution withheld from it.

That there should be differences of opinion about this view was to be expected. For a generation academicians have been cheering on the Court to ever more heroic feats, and the Court, as former Justice Abe Fortas wrote, has triggered "an economic, social, and cultural revolution." Since I question, in that book, whether the Court is empowered to act as an instrument of "revolution," I anticipated that academicians who were enamored of the judicial results—never mind their legitimacy—would vigorously defend the role of the Court. What was unexpected was the denigratory tone of their rebuttals, a tone unworthy of scholarly discourse. But Professor Charles Steinberg has since written that Academe "can be a jungle," where academicians are driven by "a deadly combination of ruthless ambition and sheer malevolent, sadistic pleasure" in "the demolition of a colleague's paper or reputation." As Exhibit I, I begin with Professor Arthur S. Miller.

One of the hoariest tactics of a debater with a weak case is to distract attention by ridiculing and attacking the opposition. Miller (Washington Post, November 13, 1977) makes no attempt to state fairly, still less to meet, the case presented by my study but resorts instead to invective. He charges me with "lawyer's history," with an "antiquarian viewpoint," with "a puerile theory of interpretation," with viewing the Constitution "through the narrow eyes of a legal mechanic." He sneeringly refers to me as "an ex-Washington lawyer turned legal historian," when in fact my historical studies go back to 1934 and won high praise from Dean Wigmore and Justice Cardozo.

In Miller's eyes my glaring sin is "reliance on the Framers' intention as the only proper standard of interpretation." More accurately, I hold that if the intention is clear, it governs. For Miller "the relevance today of those who wrote the Constitution is questionable at best"; we need not be bound by history"; "the Founding Fathers . . . cannot rule us from their graves." Yet Justice Horace Gray held that "all questions of constitutional construction [are] largely a historical question." No Justice has baldly asserted that the Framers' intention is irrelevant; to this day the Justices have repeatedly affirmed that they are seeking to give effect to the intention of the Framers. Miller is more royalist than the king.

He urges that "To interpret [the Constitution] in the same manner as, say, a contract or even statute is to forget that it is the fundamental law." A "fundamental law" that can be made to mean anything the Justices choose to make it, even in direct contradiction of the plain intention of its Framers, is no "law" at all; it is the fiat of a caliph dispensing justice under a tree, which even Miller rejects. He recognizes that the decisions of the Court "reflect the values of the Justices, dressed up in lawyer's language." But Judge Skelly Wright, in penning a defense of the Warren Court against "self-appointed scholastic mandarins," stated, "Constitutional choices are in fact different from ordinary decisions . . . the most important value-choices have already been made by the Framers of the Constitution." Miller would supplant those choices, ratified by the people, with those of the non-elected Justices. In thrusting aside the dead hands of the Framers he thrusts aside the Constitution.

The Constitution is a charter of delegated powers, drafted by a people who dreaded power and sought to "fence" it about. In Jefferson's words, they sought to bind down their delegates from "mischief" by the "chains of the Constitution." Those "chains" were fashioned out of words, and, if the Court is free to read "black" as "white," the chains are reduced to cobwebs. Miller's euphemisms disguise a claim of judicial power to rewrite the Constitution. He maintains that "It is far too late in our history to say that amendment is the only proper way to change the Constitution. Our government could not operate without extra-constitutional adjustments [by the Judiciary] in the original framework." Nixon too thought that "national security" required "extra-constitutional" power. It is never too late to complain of usurpation; power withheld cannot be wrung out of its wrongful exercise, no matter how long continued. As Hamilton said, "An agent cannot new model his own commission."

Article V confides the power of amendment to the people themselves, and then only by prescribed procedures. Elbridge Gerry, one of the Framers, explained the obvious—it was meant to be exclusive. When Miller claims for the Court power to amend the Constitution, he voices a claim that the Court has never dared to assert; instead it has "dressed up [the fact] in lawyer's language."

But enough of abstractions; let me show how the Warren Court flouted the intention of the Framers of the Fourteenth Amendment in constructing the doctrine of (to use Justice Douglas' phrase) "one person, one vote." Space permits recital of only a few out of a host of facts. In 1865–68, Justice Brennan has stated, 17 Northern states rejected universal suffrage. Senator William Fessenden, Chairman of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction of both Houses, said that there is not "the slightest probability that [suffrage] will be adopted by the states." Consequently they resorted to Paragraph 2 of the Amendment, which permits the states to deny suffrage but to suffer a reduction of representation in the House of Representatives in consequence. The Joint Committee Report explained that the states would not "surrender a power they had exercised," hence it was best to "leave the whole question with the people of each state."

JUDICIAL FABRICATION

By its "one person, one vote" doctrine, the Court clearly reversed the unmistakable choice of the people. As a matter of abstract justice the decision was impeccable; nonetheless, as Justice Harlan correctly charged, it represents an undeniable amendment of the Constitution in direct contradication of the Framers' intention. Harlan's proof, said Miller's own former colleague, Professor Robert Dixon, is "overpowering." Whence does Miller derive judicial power to revise the Constitution, to substitute the Court's own policy choices for those of the people?

Miller relies on "the delphic words of the Fourteenth Amendment." It might suffice to quote Justice Holmes's statement that when a legislature, and a fortiori the people, "has expressed its will, however indirectly, . . . that will should be recognized and obeyed." The Framers plainly expressed their will to exclude suffrage, and that will should be given effect. Miller's generalities discreetly ignore such facts. In truth, the view that "due process of law," for example, is "delphic," is drawn out of thin air. For years scholars have agreed that the transformation of "due process" from a standard of procedure in the courts to an instrument for the overthrow of legislation is a judicial fabrication.

The Founders were clear enough as to the meaning of the phrase. On the eve of the Constitutional Convention, in 1787, Hamilton declared: "The words 'due process' have a precise technical import, and are only applicable to the process and proceedings of the courts of justice; they can never be referred to an act of the legislature." Under the mantle of such "delphic" phrases the Court hides the fact that—as Frankfurter wrote President Franklin Roosevelt—it is the "Justices who speak and not the Constitution," as is confirmed by their rebuff of Justice Jackson's plea in the midst of the desegregation case to tell the people that the Court "was declaring new law for a new day." In his study of the case, Richard Kluger explains that it was unreasonable to ask the Court to admit that "there was no judicial basis for its decision," that "it was acting in a frankly unjudicial way." And for a Justice to ask that was not "unreasonable"; it was suicidal. Disclosure would have raised a storm of disapproval; it would have destroyed the myth that the Court speaks as the voice of the Constitution rather than as the voice of the Justices' own "values." Were the people aware that the rules imposed upon them represent choices of the Justices, not the Framers, they would insist upon a return to self-government; they would prefer the Constitution—"frozen in time," in Miller's derisive phrase—to the ungoverned, illimitable law-making of the Justices.

Paul Brest—a young man in a hurry—dismisses my study as a "simplistic and myopic argument, and a wrong conclusion" (New York Times, December 11, 1977). The faulty inferences and misrepresentations of fact which stud his review furnish shaky scaffolding for such charges.

Although only nine pages of my 450-page book are devoted to desegregation, Brest entitles his review "Berger v. Brown," explaining that "Berger is almost alone in arguing that the Court erred in Brown v. Board of Education—the 1954 case that struck down laws forbidding black and white children to attend the same schools." This is a demagogic appeal to the prejudice of those who assume out of hand that what is desirable is constitutional, a test rejected by the Framers and by Chief Justice Marshall. Nor is the issue to be settled by a count of noses, but rather by resort to the history of the Fourteenth Amendment. Brest himself acknowledges that when the Amendment was drafted in 1866 "the nation was not ready to eliminate" segregation. The late Alexander Bickel, whom Brest holds up to me as a model, stated, "It is impossible to conclude that the 39th Congress intended that segregation be abolished; impossible also to conclude that they foresaw it might be, under the language they were adopting."

How then does Brest deduce that the words "equal protection" embody "an ideal of racial equality"? He himself has stated that to read a word that had one meaning when the Constitution was framed in light of a different modern usage of the word "would certainly be a change of meaning (and an improper one at that)." Why, then, should words used by the Framers—e.g., "equal protection"—against a background of intention to exclude a specific subject—suffrage—fare worse? Even in 1954 the "ideal of racial equality" was not too widely shared for a fellow idealist, Professor Edmond Cahn, acknowledged that "it would have been impossible to secure adoption of a constitutional amendment to abolish 'separate but equal'." Thus my "myopia" consists in questioning the Court's right to substitute its own predilections for the choices of the Framers. Since Judge Learned Hand also regarded Brown as a "coup de main," I am hardly to be read out of the society of scholars for concurring in that conclusion.

To my demonstration that the Fourteenth Amendment was designed to "embody" the narrow objectives of the antecedent Civil Rights Act of 1866, which did not include either suffrage or mixed schools, Brest replies that "some legislators claimed the Amendment did not go beyond the Civil Rights Act, others . . . described its broad clauses in equally broad terms." Actually the overwhelming majority thought as did George Latham: the Act "covers exactly the same ground as this Amendment." Horace Flack's history of the Amendment confirms that "Nearly all said it was but an incorporation of the Civil Rights Bill . . . there was no controversy as to its purpose or meaning." They were treated as "essentially identical," wrote the distinguished historian Charles Fairman. And so were they represented to the electorate.

BRUTE FACTS

But Brest finds an "obvious difficulty": "Why didn't the drafters take the direct route of incorporating the Act's language in the Amendment?" By that test judicial review itself is fatally flawed, for it is not expressly provided for. When William Crosskey challenged the legitimiacy of judicial review on that ground, Professor Henry Hart scornfully retorted, "Professor Crosskey is a devotee of that technique of interpretation which reaches its apogee of persuasiveness in the triumphant question, 'If that's what they meant, why didn't they say so?'" The answer, to borrow from Justice Holmes, is that "it is not an adequate discharge of duty for courts to say, 'We see what you are driving at but you have not said it.'" Then too, constitutional drafting calls for the utmost compression, not the prolixity of a code, as Bickel appreciated, remarking that "enumeration of the rights in the Act" presumably was considered "inappropriate in a constitutional provision." And Brest's question—why did the Framers instead "prohibit the states from denying 'equal protection of the laws'"?—ignores my demonstration that those words were wedded by the Framers to the narrow objectives of the Act. They could hardly mean desegregation when, by Brest's own testimony, "the nation was not yet ready to eliminate [it]."

Both Miller and Brest avoid the brute facts—e.g., the massive evidence that suffrage was excluded from the Amendment—which led me to conclude with Justice Harlan, Brest's beloved mentor, that the Warren Court's "one person, one vote" lacked all historical justification. Brest's colleague, Professor Gerald Gunther, wrote that "most constitutional lawyers agree." On this score Justice Harlan declared, "When the Court disregards the express intent and understanding of the Framers, it has invaded the realm of the political process to which the amending power was committed, and it has violated the constitutional structure which it is its highest duty to protect." (Emphasis added: Italic.) Am I to be excommunicated for agreeing with Justice Harlan?

Like Miller, Brest considers that my cardinal sin is insisting that "the constitutional interpretation should depend chiefly on the intent of those who framed and adopted a provision." He prefers the view that "whatever the Framers' expectation may have been, broad constitutional guarantees [e.g., equal protection] require the Court to discern, articulate, and apply values that are widely and deeply held by our society." For him the "touchstone . . . is not the intent of people long since dead, but the consent of the living," which he discovers in the "processes of appointing judges and carrying out their decisions."

Judges are appointed to "defend the Constitution," not to revise it. What Brest is arguing for is ratification of judicial revision by popular inertia, for he points to no other index of the "consent of the living." But Hamilton, the great apologist for judicial review, declared that the Constitution is binding "until the people have, by some solemn and authoritative act, annulled or changed the established form . . . and no presumption, or even knowledge of their sentiments, can warrant their representatives in a departure from it, prior to such an act." It is no answer to invoke Chief Justice Marshall's dictum that the Constitution was "to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs," because Marshall categorically disclaimed the interpretation of his dictum as "the assertion of a [judicial] right to change" the Constitution. After Professor Gunther discovered this disclaimer, he observed that "ritual invoking of Marshall's authority" no longer should serve to bolster the argument for unlimited discretion. Unlike its apologists, the Court has never openly laid claim to a power to amend the Constitution. Instead, as former Solicitor General Robert Bork wrote, "Value choices are attributed to the Founding Fathers, not the Court." And, he comments, such statements indicate the Court's awareness of what "its customers demand," that is, effectuation of the Framers' design, not substitution of a non-polled "consent of the living."

Justice Holmes's "more than anxiety" about unlimited judicial policy-making under a Constitution that confers no unlimited power cannot be laughed away; and it is a disservice to the American people to delude them into thinking they have surrendered self-government to the Court.●

OF OHIO

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to pay personal tribute to a group of dedicated American women, the Sisters of the Humility of Mary. Among their many accomplishments is the fact that they are exceptional educators. Two of the high schools which they operate are Magnificat High School in Cleveland, Ohio and Villa Maria High School in Villa Maria, Pa. The faculty of these exceptional schools founded an exceptional organization, the Center for Learning, Inc. which publishes educational materials used by private and public schools throughout the country.

Recently, one of their seniors Maryanne Povinelli who won first prize at the International Science and Engineering Fair in Anaheim, Calif. Much credit is to be given to the principal of Magnificat High School, Sister Rose Shaffer for providing the progressive atmosphere to enable students to grow in light of the times, and to Maryanne's science teacher, Sister Joan Acker who arranged for and guided Maryanne through the project. Both are exceptional teachers. I know. I was educated by them as a high school student at the former Lourdes Academy. The following is the article written about the award in our Cleveland Press:

[From the Cleveland Press, May 18, 1976]

MAGNIFICENT SENIOR WINS SCIENCE FAIR 'OLYMPICS'

(By Wally Guenther)

Maryanne Povinelli, 18, of Westlake, is an international champion of the "Olympics of high school science."

Maryanne, a senior at Magnificat High School, won first prize in the medicine and health category in the 29th International Science and Engineering Fair in Anaheim, Calif.

It marked the first time a Greater Cleveland high school student won a grand prize in the science fair competition.

She bested 53 finalists in her category. In all, there were 451 entries in 11 categories represented by students from the United States, Canada, Puerto Rico, Japan, Mexico and Sweden.

None of this has mind-boggled the modest student. She is wearing a shy grin around the hallways this week. It was the fourth time she had entries in the fair.

Her national-winning project was "A Determination of the Presence of an Angiotensin II—Related to Peptide in the Brain."

In layman's terms, angiotensin is a hormone which produces an increase in blood pressure. Maryanne worked several months with rabbits and rats brain tissues and found there is a central mechanism for blood pressure control.

Her findings are to be reprinted in a European medical science journal.

She worked closely with Dr. Alan Moore, formerly of the Cleveland Clinic, in her research.

Her win also brought other awards.

She received a $250 cash award and another $250 goes to Magnificat High. She was given an American Medical Assn. merit award and an Air Force award for which she will later tour several Air Force bases in the United States.

Her list of prizes is topped off with a five-day visit to London and a nine-day visit to Stockholm next December.

Maryanne was one of the two grand winners of the Northeastern Ohio Science and Engineering Fair held here last March. It is cosponsored by The Press.

The other winner, Charles P. Irsak, a North Olmsted High School senior, won third prize in the national competition in the Biochemistry catagory in Anaheim.

Maryanne is the oldest of the seven children of Mr. and Mrs. Louis Povinelli of 1415 Prince Charles Ave.

Her father has a doctorate in engineering. He is an aeronautical engineer with NASA's Lewis Research Center.

Her mother has a doctorate in speech and audiology and works with children with disabilities.

Maryanne was presented her award last weekend. But that wasn't the only excitement then in the Povinelli household.

Her sisters, Karen, 13, and Kathleen, 16, finished second and third respectively in their women's divisions of Sunday's Cleveland Revco 26-mile marathon.

And their father also finished the marathon.

This fall, Maryanne will enter Harvard's premedical school to major in medical research.

She goes there with impressive credentials.●

RESTRUCTURING OUR HEALTH CARE SYSTEM

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am requesting that an article which appeared in the May 13, 1978, Saturday Review, entitled "Why We Can't Afford National Health Insurance," by Robert Claiborne, be reprinted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Actually, the title of the article is misleading; Mr. Claiborne argues forcefully that we can, indeed, afford national health insurance, but only if we restructure third-party payments in our health-care delivery system so that wasteful expenditures do not continue to be encouraged.

Mr. Claiborne has pinpointed the dilemma those of us in Congress who believe national health insurance must be enacted face in trying to win support for comprehensive benefits for all our citizens. Our national health expenditures are expected to rise to $200 billion in 1980. Under our present incentives system, the greater the funds to finance the system, the greater the waste.

Mr. Claiborne does not propose any reduction in spending on health care; he simply suggests third-party payors give preferred status to providers which operate efficiently while maintaining their high quality of medical care. Third-party payors could classify institutions according to an efficiency/quality ratio, and encourage patients they insure to seek medical services from these preferred providers. Lower premiums or copayments could be offered by third-party payors to reward the insured for using a preferred provider.

This idea was proposed for the private sector by Dr. Paul M. Ellwood, Jr., a Minnesota health consultant, and the proposal is equally applicable to the public sector—medicare and medicaid—as demonstrated by Prof. Alain Enthoven's consumer choice health plan.

An obvious analogy is that consumers will gravitate to cars with efficient fuel consumption if cars are publicly rated for efficiency, and if our tax incentives at the time a car or gas is purchased make fuel economy a top priority for the consumer.

While I am somewhat skeptical of the ability of insurers and other third-party payors to accurately classify hospitals by an efficiency/quality ratio, this article is certainly worthy of our study as we deliberate on proposals for national health insurance in the months ahead:

WHY WE CANNOT AFFORD NATIONAL HEALTH INSURANCE

(By Robert Claiborne)

After several years in suspended animation, national health insurance has again become a live political issue. The Carter administration wants it, or says it does. Some powerful people in Congress, including Senator Edward Kennedy, want it and are now dickering with the administration over the provisions of a new health insurance bill to be introduced later this year. And according to the polls, a majority of Americans want it.

Despite these powerful forces pushing for national health insurance, we won't get it this year for the practical reason that both the administration and the Congress have enough on their plates already. Whether we get it next year or in 1980, and in what form, depends on a lot of things; perhaps the most important of these is whether we can afford it.

The blunt truth is that we can't—unless and until we make some fundamental changes in our current system of delivering and paying for health care. That system, as I explained in an earlier article [SR, "The Great Health Care Rip-off," January 7], is organized in a way that encourages waste and penalizes efficiency, and 30 years of history have shown that the greater the funds available to finance the system, the greater the waste. Before we pump more tens of billions of dollars in federal money into health care, we need to plug the leaks tha are already wasting tens of billions—thereby helping to push our national health bill from $140 billion in 1976 to some $165 billion this year to an estimated $200 billion in 1980.

The Carter administration has already proposed to control health costs by imposing "caps" on hospital spending—limiting spending to a specific percentage increase each year. Congress is cool toward this plan, preferring—for the present, at least—a similar but strictly voluntary plan proposed by the hospitals themselves.

Neither approach is likely to accomplish much, for two reasons. First, caps apply only to hospitals—though doctors' charges and many other items on our national health bill have been increasing almost as fast as hospital spending. Second, they would at best slow the rise in hospital costs when what is needed is to cut those costs. A more sophisticated version oi the caps approach, called "prospective reimbursement," would cure some of these weaknesses but only at the price of enormous administrative complexity.

All these proposals, whatever their probable impact, amount to attempted quick fixes of the health cost problem, tantamount to treating a broken leg with a Band-Aid. Health costs are escalating primarily because our health care system is wasteful, squandering, in Senator Kennedy's words, "billions of dollars on unnecessary drugs, unnecessary hospitalization, unnecessary surgery, unnecessary technology." And it is wasteful because all the incentives built into it reward waste and discourage thrift. The various quick fixes would at best impose regulatory counterincentives on this chaotic system instead of changing the existing incentives. The result, if history is any guide, would be feeble regulation—and reams of bureaucratic paper work.

If what we need is not counterincentives but a new incentive system, how can we get it?

Proposals for restructuring the incentives in health care fall into two basic categories, depending on whether the incentives apply to consumers (patients and their families) or to providers (doctors, hospitals, and so forth). The consumer approach, favored by much of the health care establishment and by many conservative economists, involves making the patient pay more of the bill directly rather than through "third parties" (Blue Cross, commercial insurance companies, or government)—in effect, imposing a financial penalty every time a person visits a doctor or enters a hospital.

The idea is economically valid, since years of experience have shown that the more people have to pay directly for health care, the less care—other things equal—they demand (for instance, before Medicaid, poor people saw doctors less often than rich people did, though on the average the poor get sicker oftener). The problem is that the consumer approach would penalize necessary health services equally with unnecessary ones. Indeed, the sicker the patient—meaning the more services he or she would need and the greater the probable loss of income—the higher the penalty!

Looked at more closely, the consumer approach involves the kind of simpleminded analysis often indulged in by conservative economists: Since the growth of third-party payments has encouraged waste, this analysis argues, cutting back on these payments will cut waste. The logic is impeccable—but the premise is faulty. Third-party payments have indeed encouraged waste within the dominant American system of delivering health care; in other systems, as we shall see in a moment, they have done precisely the reverse.

In the dreamworld of the economist, the purchase of health care is exactly like the purchase of any other commodity: the result of consumer decisions; in the real world, health care decisions are overwhelmingly made not by consumers but by doctors. If we want to establish incentives for less wasteful decisions, the obvious place to apply them is to the decision makers.

One way of giving doctors incentives to curb waste would be through the legendary Chinese system, whereby a doctor was paid only so long as his patient stayed well. A modern, and by no means legendary, version of this approach is currently used by groups looking after the health needs of some seven million Americans. These groups are sometimes—and inaccurately—called health maintenance organizations (HMOs). The 175 HMOs now in operation cannot of course do much to "maintain" their members' health—in other words, keep them from getting sick. What they can do is supply high-quality care at low cost through comprehensive, prepaid medical plans.

A good example of an HMO is the Group Health Cooperative (GHC) of Puget Sound, which serves more than one sixth of the population in the Seattle region of Washington. GHC owns a 300-bed hospital and recently opened a second, smaller one; other services are delivered through nine neighborhood health centers staffed by salaried doctors, nurses, and technicians. All these facilities are owned and controlled by GHC consumer members.

For some 31 years, GHC has supplied its members with medical, hospital, laboratory, and X-ray services—plus most prescription drugs—at between 60 percent and 65 percent of what the rest of us spend per person for these services. The secret of this achievement is almost childishly simple: GHC members pay a flat monthly fee regardless of how much health care they use. Since the organization must work within a fixed budget, it has the most obvious incentive to make sure that subscribers get only such services as they need, delivered in the least costly way—notably, outside the hospital if at all possible. In fact, GHC members average only a little over one third as much hospitalization as the average American does. Nor do the economies stop there: Though GHC delivers a much higher than average proportion of its services outside the hospital, the cost per patient is no greater than the national average.

An obvious question is whether GHC in its zeal to cut costs is not cutting necessary services along with unnecessary ones, thereby providing inferior care. The most obvious answer is that it has more than doubled its membership in the past 10 years; it must be doing something right. No less important is the fact that the group's board of trustees is elected from and by the membership—and can be thrown out by them if they are dissatisfied.

Also worth noting is the fact that GHC members are subject to almost no "consumer incentives": Apart from comparatively small charges for obstetrical services, they pay no extras regardless of how much care they get. Yet they see their doctor no oftener than the average American does and (as we have seen) go into the hospital a lot less. If penalizing the patient is what it takes to lower health costs, GHC's costs should be among the highest in the nation; in fact, they are among the lowest.

GHC itself concedes that its record of cost containment cannot quite be equaled on a national basis because the average age of its members is somewhat below that of Americans in general, and older people require more health care than do the young. Nonetheless, if GHC can deliver quality care for 30 percent to 35 percent less than the national average, the widespread application of its cost-efficient incentive system could cut our personal health expenditures by 25 percent to 30 percent. In 1977, this would have saved us a minimum of $25 billion—over $450 for the average family. Think about that the next time you pay a doctor's bill—or your income tax!

Not all HMOs are as cost efficient as GHC is. As one might expect, those that own their own hospital run more economically than those that must buy hospital services on the open market. However, few if any HMOs fail to deliver health care for substantially less than other systems in their area. Which raises the obvious question: Why aren't there more HMOs?

The answer, like most answers in the health care field, is long and complicated. At their beginning in the 1930s and 1940s, HMOs faced bitter opposition from the American Medical Association (AMA), which denounced them as unAmerican and worse. It refused membership to HMO doctors (meaning that in some states they could not be licensed) and encouraged its members to deny them "hospital privileges"—the rather basic "privilege" of getting patients admitted to a hospital. Only after several lawsuits (one was carried to the Supreme Court) did AMA stop this blacklisting.

Another major share of the blame falls on Blue Cross. Its longtime policy of in effect subsidizing hospital inefficiency (a policy subsequently taken over by Medicare and Medicaid) partly nullified the HMOs' competitive advantage. Moreover, both Blue Cross and the commercial health insurance companies tended to regard HMOs as competitors for the health care dollar.

If HMOs have suffered from their enemies and competitors, they have also suffered from their "friends": notably, former governor Ronald Reagan, of California. In the early 1970s, Reagan, with much fanfare, encouraged the formation of Prepaid Health Plans (PHPs)—HMO-like organizations whose purpose was to deliver health services to the poor. PHPs, he said, would cut the cost of California's Medicaid program (called Medi-Cal) by at least 10 percent. In fact, like many other programs allegedly designed to benefit the poor, PHPs turned out to benefit mainly the people handing out the benefits.

One of the biggest PHPs was Consolidated Medical Systems, Ltd. (CMS), headed by one Donald K. Kelly, M.D. Like GHC and most other HMOs, it was set up as a nonprofit corporation, but there the resemblance ended. It was not owned or even controlled by its subscribers but by another corporation, HMO International—which was by no means nonprofit. Oddly enough, HMO International was also headed by Dr. Kelly.

As things turned out, there was little that was medical about Consolidated Medical Systems. Its "system" consisted of buying medical and other services from corporations that operated under half a dozen different names but that had a strong family resemblance: None was nonprofit and every one was 100 percent owned or controlled by CMB's "godfather" corporation, HMO International—meaning, by Dr. Kelly and his friends.

CMS signed up Medi-Cal patients—those who looked relatively healthy, that is—by methods that the district attorney of San Diego later called "false, deceptive, and misleading." Its door-to-door salesmen—some dressed in white coats—promised 24-hour service, free transportation to health centers, and other goodies.

Measured against these golden promises, CMS's performance turned out to look remarkably like a goldbrick. A 1972 report by a group of labor-health consultants found the qualifications of its doctors well below average and gave the same verdict on the hospitals it patronized (all profit-making, of course). CMS patients got less than half as much hospitalization as did members of established—and efficient—HMOs.

Eventually, of course, the facts about CMS and other PHPs began hitting the fan through reports by the press. Investigations by the state revealed, among other things, that the 15 largest PHPs were spending less than half their income on patient care (established HMOs average 90 percent to 95 percent). By 1976, more than half the PHPs had vanished, among them CMS, whose assets were taken over by HMO International. The latter is still in the health care business—so far as the public record goes, competently—though without the help of the ingenious Dr. Kelly, who is now merely a stockholder.

California's catastrophic venture into HMO-type medical care was naturally cited by some commentators as evidence that HMOs don't work. In fact, the rip-offs occurred not through any basic weakness in the HMO concept but because Regan and Company let them happen: The PHPs got away with their perhaps legal swindles because Regan was busy with his own political swindle—"saving the taxpayers' money." As the old-time con men used to say, you can't cheat an honest man.

The next attempt to encourage HMOs turned out to be as abortive in its own way as the PHP program was. In 1973, the Nixon administration sponsored a bill providing various advantages, including federal loans and grants for start-up money, to "approved" HMOs. The result, according to administration press releases, would be hundreds of new HMOs and billions of tax dollars saved. As finally passed however, the bill reflected the common liberal desire to do everything for everybody, with the result—probably foreseen by those conservatives who supported it—that very little was done for anybody.

To become approved, HMOs were required to offer far more elaborate—and expensive—benefits than existing insurance plans did, meaning that few people could afford them. Even worse, HMOs had to enroll everyone who applied at the same rate. On the face of it, that seemed only fair, but what it meant in practice was that approved HMOs could find their rolls swamped by the elderly and the chronically ill, who could get ordinary health insurance only at prohibitive rates. To accept such people at the same rate as everyone else would mean either bankruptcy or an overall rise in rates that would drive out younger and healthier subscribers. Not surprisingly, few HMOs bothered to seek approval under the law, and efforts to rewrite it more realistically stalled as the administration's interest turned increasingly from saving the nation to saving its own neck. Only in 1976 did Congress remove most of the law's Catch-22s.

Despite the best—or worst—efforts of both friends and enemies however, HMOs have continued to grow and multiply. They have demonstrated that with a proper incentive system, cost-efficient health care is possible, and in some communities they have served as incentives for increased cost-consciousness by other providers. Thus, doctors threatened by HMO competition have begun forming "medical foundations," in which a network of individual doctors and hospitals offer comprehensive care at a flat annual fee, as HMOs do, and Blue Cross has become involved with HMO-type plans in some communities.

Increasingly, HMOs are looking like an idea whose time has come—but for all that, they aren't going to come overnight. Many doctors dislike them—partly because of AMA indoctrination and partly because the doctors believe they can make more money in private practice. HMO doctors are well paid and also enjoy fringe benefits that other doctors do not, but they still don't make the kind of money that some private practitioners do.

Nor do all consumers take readily to HMO medicine. HMOs are efficient partly because they consolidate their operations in neighborhood health centers. In one sense, this can be a plus for the patient, since it means one-stop medicine, with no need to make extra trips for X rays or lab tests. However, until an HMO has been operating for some time, it can hardly afford to set up more than one or two centers—meaning that some subscribers face a fairly lengthy trip to the doctor. Some consumers also dislike the fact that their subscription covers only HMO doctors; should they choose to consult an outside physician, the fee comes out of their own pockets.

Unfortunately but inescapably, health care, like any other area of economic life, involves trade-offs. If we want to spend less money on gasoline, we have got to drive smaller cars and drive them slower; if we want to spend less on health care, we have got to accept the limitations and occasional inconvenience that cost-efficient medicine entails. No health care system can give everybody everything; there isn't that much money in the world.

If we consumers—who ultimately pay for the health care system—must accept trade-offs if we hope to pay less, then the third parties who hand out our money have got to make trade-offs of their own: specifically, to quit subsidizing wasteful providers. This means not just Blue Cross-Blue Shield and the commercial insurance companies but also the federal government's Medicare-Medicaid. All of these have tended to reimburst providers for whatever they spend, wasteful or not. Moreover, the Medicare-Medicaid reimbursement formulas, thanks to conservative pressure and bureaucratic foot dragging, have made it difficult and sometimes impossible for cost-efficient providers to accept patients under these plans. In 1970, for example, Medicare in Seattle paid GHC only $202 a year per patient; to other providers it paid an average of $356.

As regards Blue Cross-Blue Shield, an important step toward ending their subsidization of waste would be to eliminate conflict of interest in their operations by removing providers of health care from their local boards of directors. Government now has no power to do this directly, but since its payments to the Blues, as disbursing agents for Medicare-Medicaid, account for something like half their total revenue, it has powerful leverage if it cares to use it. The Blues could be told flatly that if they want to continue as channels for disbursing tax money, they have got to clean up their act—by cutting their ties to those who receive the money.

Given a firm stand by government, both the Blues and the commercial insurance companies would become more receptive toward supporting cost-effective medicine, both through HMOs and through other less structured plans. Proposals along the latter line mostly involve a special type of what life insurance people call "experience rating"—a principle that is probably as old as insurance. Experience rating is the reason it costs less to buy life insurance at age thirty than at age fifty: Experience shows that people of thirty are likely to live longer.

Insurance companies have long used experience rating in setting premiums for group health policies, basing their figures on the expected medical needs of the particular group rather than on the average costs for the community or nation. Dr. Paul M. Ellwood, Jr., a Minnesota health-systems consultant who has long plugged for cost-efficient medicine, is among those who have proposed applying experience rating not just to health care consumers but to health care providers as well.

As Ellwood explains it, doctors and hospitals in a community would be rated by what they charged for a given service and by how effectively they avoided unnecessary services. Based on their efficiency, they would be grouped into "alliances." Insurance companies including the Blues) could then vary their premiums or benefits according to which alliance policyholders selected. Those who chose to patronize an alliance of proved efficiency would pay less, or get more, than those who selected other providers. It would be something like the Chinese restaurant menu in which you can pick "three from Group B or two from Group A." The Group B selections are of course less fancy than the Group A ones—but no less nourishing.

Complementing Ellwood's plan for the private sector, Professor Alain Enthoven, a Stanford management expert, has proposed a somewhat similar plan for the public sector—Medicare-Medicaid (and, in principle, national health insurance). Under his Consumer Choice Health Plan, government would continue to pay the health costs of the elderly and the poor, as at present—but only up to a certain level. The figure would be set according to the age of the individual and the cost of efficient care in his or her community, as provided by one or more qualified health plans—HMOs, medical foundations, alliances, or whatever. Patients who chose an efficient plan would have their expenses covered 100 percent (Medicaid) or 80 percent (Medicare); those who chose to patronize less efficient plans would have to pay any additional costs themselves.

Thus both the Ellwood and the Enthoven plans would involve consumer incentives—but with a difference. Patients would not be penalized for using health services as such but only for using inefficient providers of those services. At the same time, providers would be given a strong incentive to improve efficiency, since those who did not would tend to lose patients to those who did.

By no coincidence, both these plans have important resemblances to traditional HMOs: what amounts to a flat annual fee (in the form of an insurance premium or a government subsidy) and certain limitations on the patient's freedom of choice among doctors and hospitals. Both in short involve the kinds of trade-offs that the HMO experience has shown to be required for cost-efficient care, at least under anything remotely like our present system. The only alternative would be a national health service such as exists in Sweden or Great Britain—and the chances of such a system being adopted during this century are remote.

Whether the Ellwood and Enthoven plans would work as well in practice as they seem to work on paper remains to be seen. But their basic principle—giving both consumers and providers incentives to use or provide more efficient health care—unquestionably makes sense.

Whether these plans, or something like them, will actually be written into law—especially a national health insurance law—also remains to be seen. Since many doctors and hospitals have done very well for themselves under the present wasteful system, they will certainly try to block any major change in it—and both groups have considerable clout in national and state legislatures. Health care consumers by contrast are mostly unorganized and therefore politically feeble. However, there are signs that some other politically powerful groups are beginning to get into the act—on the consumers' side. These are some of the big labor unions—whose leaders recognize that more money spent for health benefits means less available for wages and pensions—and some big corporations—who are concerned about their constantly rising contributions to employee health plans. A real political push from these groups would markedly improve the prospects for meaningful reorganization of our present health care system.

Added support for effective cost control may come from the commercial health insurance companies themselves. Concerned that national health insurance might squeeze them out entirely, these companies are beginning to recognize that their best chance of avoiding a squeeze out involves taking visible and effective steps to curb costs. Industry spokesmen say that they now favor Ellwood's plan of applying experience rating to providers—but are leery of implementing it because of possible antitrust action by the government. The Justice Department, they claim, considers that concerted industry action to reduce health premiums would be just as much a "restraint of trade" as a similar action to raise premiums—which if true suggests that the department needs a lesson in elementary economics. Probably the simplest way of resolving the difficulty would be for the industry to publicly ask both the Justice Department and the Congress for permission to use experience rating in this way; even if Justice said no, Congress would almost certainly say yes.

Given the present lineup of forces, the balance may well be swung by two other factors. The first factor is whether Congress and the Carter administration can really get their heads together on the kind of rational approach to cost control we have been discussing. The second is how effectively informed, though unorganized, citizens can turn the heat on their representatives: In a close fight, such pressure could well make the difference.

Restructuring incentives in health care is the first and most essential step toward curbing health costs but by no means the last. The next and most obvious one is cutting down on unnecessary hospitalization and surgery, as the HMOs have already demonstrated can be done. Beyond this are other methods hitherto employed only experimentally in a few places. These include treating some seriously ill patients at home—which in individual cases is as safe as treating them in hospitals, and a lot cheaper. Another step is training groups of chronically ill patients (especially elderly ones) to help care for one another instead of relying entirely on paid professionals. Experiments have shown that this system not only cuts costs but also improves patients' morale by making them feel less dependent.

Over the longer run, curbing health costs means cleaning up the environment, since pollution is not merely unattractive but usually unhealthy as well. A concerted effort to abolish this source of disease would be expensive—but probably cheaper than our present policy of letting diseases develop and then spending billions of dollars to treat them. (It is worth recalling that the single most effective health program in history involved not treatment but prevention: providing the sanitary water and sewage systems that ended such plagues as typhoid and cholera.) Another kind of prevention would involve changing our personal life-styles, which obviously can affect our health (through overeating, overdrinking, and smoking). Yet another would involve the problem of poverty, which throughout history has been—and remains—a fertile source of disease.

Central to any of these measures, however, are two changes in human thinking. The first is for all Americans to recognize that whoever ostensibly pays for health care, we have to foot the bill—through higher prices, higher insurance premiums, and higher taxes. No less important is the recognition by both doctors and patients that bigger isn't necessarily better and may well be worse. Measured by its plant and equipment, the American health care system is the most technologically profligate in the world. Measured by its hospital admissions, surgical operations, and laboratory tests, it is probably the busiest in the world—and it is unquestionably the costliest in the world. But measused by results—maintaining or restoring the health of the American people—it is by no means the best in the world or even one of the best.

It could be. But to change "could be" to "is" will require some deep thinking by all of us on what health means and on how best to get and keep it. And that, as the man said, is another story.●

EATING YOUR SEED CORN

HON. JOHN M. ASHBROOK

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, last week this Government of ours started selling off one of the few tangible assets we have, our gold. Liberals have been in charge of our governmental policies for about four decades now and the chickens are coming home to roost.

How well I recall the Senate debates some 15 years ago when the Walter Heller school of economics told us all we needed no gold cover to protect the American dollar. Gold was an 18th century anomaly, they confidently argued. Modern industrial states need no gold or silver reserves. We went off the modest gold backing of our dollar then and, combined with liberal deficit spending and big government policies, we have been on a long, hard slide ever since.

Now we are auctioning off the gold. I often tell my constituents that there is more commonsense within a 1-mile radius of Johnstown, Ohio, or Fredericktown or Loudonville or Galion—virtually anywhere in the 17th Ohio District—than you will see in the whole city of Washington. My farmer friends would have a simple rule they would point out to these liberals, the 20th century plunderers of this country.

Simply stated, you don't eat your seed corn. We have lived on hot air and deficits for years. Now the liberals have us eating our seed corn. When that is gone . . . Oh well.●

THE RISING TIDE OF HOPE

HON. DONALD M. FRASER

OF MINNESOTA

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. FRASER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to include in the RECORD a copy of a very thoughtful article written by the Honorable Ambassador Andrew Young entitled "The Rising Tide of Hope," which appeared in May of this year in A.D. magazine, a publication of the United Church of Christ and the United Methodist Church. Ambassador Young has provided us with very inspiring and creative leadership at the United Nations, and has been especially helpful in efforts to strengthen the effectiveness of that organization in the field of human rights. The document follows:

THE RISING TIDE OF HOPE

(By Andrew Young)

Hubert Humphrey once said that "human rights is what the United States is all about." As we read the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, it's obvious that that is also what the U.N. is all about.

As President Carter said on October 5, 1977, when he signed the two human rights covenants at the U.N.:

"Of the many affinities between the United States and the United Nations, perhaps the most important is that both had their origins in a vision of the greatness of the human possibility.

"The American Declaration of Independence speaks of the idea that, and I quote, '. . . all men are created equal, . . . endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.'

"The Charter of the United Nations speaks of 'faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small.'"

But I think we can go further—and make a categorical statement: All governments should be dedicated to the pursuit of human rights and dignity for all persons and peoples. When we forget this we run a serious risk of letting governments become ends in themselves or even enemies of human rights. The ship of state exists for the passengers, not for the crew or the ship itself.

Our own Bill of Rights and the U.N.'s Universal Declaration of Human Rights spell out with sufficient detail and clarity the basic specifics and definitions of human rights for most purposes. These two documents should be required study for all children—not as documents of historical or intellectual interest alone, but as guidelines for future action by all societies.

I come out of several traditions that have always put human rights at the center of their activities and near the top of their value systems.

As an inheritor of the Judeo-Christian tradition, I look back to Moses as the leader of one of the first liberation movements: He led the children of Israel out of Egypt and away from Pharaoh's bondage.

As a black man, I am an inheritor of a tradition where people sang about freedom even while in slavery—and continued to sing "Oh, Freedom" in our own time, confronted with police dogs, bombings, and fire hoses.

As an American I remember with pride that in World War II our nation resisted the tide of Fascism in Europe, Africa, and Asia. And, as an American, I see the Constitution as a basic framework for protecting human rights within the rule of law.

These three legacies have converged for me in my present job at the United Nations. Because the American people wanted a foreign policy that reflected our national belief in human rights and dignity, and because President Carter promised a foreign policy that was as good and decent as are the American people, I can be true to my threefold heritage and try to fulfill the role of a United States Ambassador as the same time. Our national values and our national foreign policy are coming together in our policy on human rights.

In formulating our human rights foreign policy, we start from some very basic premises—that all persons and all peoples desire freedom and justice for themselves and realize that their freedom is never secure until all others have freedom and justice as well.

We also believe that all peoples are basically capable of self-government, and that democracy and human rights are not Western inventions, but to paraphrase Reinhold Niebuhr are made possible by our potential for goodness and made necessary by our potential for evil.

We Americans have always believed that rule by law and rule by democratic majority are not only compatible but mutually reinforcing, and that they are the surest defense of human rights and dignity. Not only from our own history but from observation of the experiences of other peoples, we know that no people can depend with certainty on the good will of a king, a general, a dictator, an entrenched elite, another class, or another race to give them their human rights or their freedom or their dignity.

Every people and every nation must build and protect its own democratic society if it is to guarantee human rights and dignity for all its own citizens, if it is to be a positive support rather than an obstacle in the struggle for a world order of law and justice.

In the world today at least two thirds of the people lack some of the basic human needs, and three fourths are denied most of the basic human civil and political rights. Under such circumstances it seems difficult to be very optimistic about progress in the field of basic human needs and human rights.

Indeed, it can be argued that democracy and decency are on the defensive, isolated in a hostile world. Some people see the United Nations as the proof of this proposition.

I see the U.N., especially as reflected in the 1977 session of the General Assembly, in a very different way. The U.N. is the center of a struggle to create a new world consensus based on a broader understanding of human rights and freedom than a purely Western vision.

I believe that the United Nations is one of the critical crucibles in which this new global approach to development and democracy is being formulated and tested.

It is necessary to have a sense of general strategy if we are to have any hope of utilizing our limited resources in an effective way in the struggle for freedom and human rights.

We can't expect to fight every battle at the same time, much less win every battle, especially in the early phases of our struggle. It is critical that we act as catalysts to assist all the peoples of the world in a common effort.

What are the key struggles in the world today that must be won to make possible the strengthening of the human rights movement?

1. The realization that economic, social, cultural, civil, and political rights are interdependent and interrelated.

For too long the United Nations community has been locked into a sterile and false confrontation inspired by the cold war, between those who insisted that civil and political rights must come first, and those who argued that those rights must wait until basic economic development had been achieved.

We now see clearly that no rights are secure until all are secure. This means we must broaden our struggle for human rights to include programs for economic and social justice as well as condemnations of those who torture political prisoners and close congresses and shut down newspapers.

A few months before he was murdered, Martin Luther King Jr. gave a series of lectures over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation network. He began one of these lectures by stating forthrightly: "Disinherited people all over the world are bleeding to death from deep social and economic wounds."

He went on to bring the problem home: "In our society it is murder, psychologically, to deprive a man of a job or an income. You are in substance saying to that man that he has no right to exist. You are in a real way depriving him of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, denying in his case the very creed of his society. Now, millions of people are being strangled that way. The problem is international in scope. And it is getting worse, as the gap between the poor and the affluent society increases."

Those words were written in 1967. Now, more than a decade later, they are still tragically true. The misery of millions deepens. We do not need to be reminded of what happened to King's last great campaign to unite poor people and to awaken the conscience of America to the reality of poverty and how it defiles human dignity and makes freedom a mockery.

We do not need to be reminded how this nation lost its way in the morass of Vietnam and quagmire of Watergate: how we lost for a while our sense of purpose and direction; and how during this period Martin Luther King Jr. lost his life—a victim in the war against poverty. He died as he lived, a nonviolent soldier in the cause of human rights, of economic justice for the sanitation workers of Memphis.

What Martin Luther King Jr. tried to tell us is what the Third World nations are trying to tell us: civil and political rights are necessary, but they are not enough.

If King were with us today he would still be talking about unemployment, because that is still a major domestic problem. Our commitment to human rights everywhere in the world will ring loud and hollow until we find better and more urgent ways of addressing that problem at home.

2. Ratification of the U.N. Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the Covenant on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights.

Last October at the United Nations President Carter signed these two covenants as a prelude to their being submitted to the Senate for ratification sometime in the future. During the next few years it seems to me that the churches and synagogues of the United States have a very difficult but very important task in the preparation of the American people for considering the ratification of these two important treaties.

If there was ever a task upon which all the religious communities of the United States ought to be able to unite and mobilize their full resources, it should be this one.

The struggle for the ratification of these two covenants will give us a chance to see the interrelatedness and the interdependence of civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights, and to see how they apply to our nation. In the reading of these two texts, we will all become newly aware of how far we still have to go to realize human rights, full dignity, and fundamental freedoms for all Americans.

3. The independence of Namibia.

This small nation has struggled with dignity for years to gain its rightful spot among the nations of the world, against an efficient but very repressive South African occupation. Because Namibia is a Trust Territory of the United Nations, which South Africa has for many years refused to acknowledge, the independence of Namibia has become a symbol of the impotence but also of the potential of the United Natious.

When Namibia becomes independent, it will greatly enhance the drive for independence of Zimbabwe (Rhodesia) and hasten the advent of democracy in South Africa itself. The nations of Africa are waiting for this test of the seriousness of the Western powers and the United Nations to see if they can fully commit themselves to a new "human rights majority" in the United Nations.

4. Human rights in Uganda.

Nowhere is the credibility of the international community's commitment to human rights more severely tested than in its capacity to confront the tragic consequences for the people of Uganda under the rule of Idi Amin. Only the other African nations can deal effectively with this problem, but they need the support and encouragement of the rest of us. When a firm international stand has been taken, led by other African nations, the human rights movement will gain much more credibility and momentum.

5. The return of democracy in Chile.

The tragic loss of freedom of the people in Chile in 1973, followed by the torture and disappearance of many political prisoners, shocked the world and the United Nations. With its long tradition of democracy, it is to be hoped that Chile will soon have a civilian, constitutional government. This will greatly encourage all other peoples who have suffered subversion of their democratic institutions in recent years.

6. The establishment of democratic rule in Zimbabwe.

If this can be done in a fair, orderly, and peaceful manner, it will set a pattern for South Africa, and show the good faith of the Western powers. If Zimbabwe can achieve majority rule with protection for the freedom and rights of all its citizens, it will be a powerful argument for democratic rule and human rights.

7. Ratification of the Panama Canal Treaties.

These are fair treaties, negotiated over many years under several U.S. presidents, between the world's most powerful nation and a small but proud country. Senate ratification of these treaties will go a long way to restoring our credibility in Latin America and righting an ancient wrong. With ratification, our human rights policy will become an even more powerful encouragement to the repressed peoples in Latin America, and there is reason to believe it will hasten the emergence of new democracies in the Western Hemisphere.

These issues certainly do not exhaust the list of basic human rights issues in the modern world. There are massive problems of hunger and malnutrition in some countries that deny the basic human right of food. Torture and other forms of repression exist in many nations. Many countries, including our own, suffer from the problem of large-scale unemployment. Racism still blights the lives of millions. Most peoples in the world do not enjoy freedom of speech, nor the protection of an independent judicial system. And, of course, the basic obstacle to the realization of full human rights is still poverty.

Many governments refuse to admit they have any problems. Such arrogance is not only ill-founded, it seriously hinders the frank debate that is the key to democratic problem-solving. The United States can help diminish this problem by refusing to be provoked by criticisms, and by admitting candidly our problems as well as steadfastly defending our traditions and accomplishments in human rights.

We all know, for instance, that the Soviet Union harasses its dissidents and its Jewish population—and denies it while at the same time remaining very sensitive to any foreign criticism. We can take heart from the fact that the measured concern of President Carter has had a positive impact on Soviet sensitivities.

Another example of a country where there are continuing and well substantiated cases of human rights violations is South Korea. The jailing and silencing of those who dare to speak out against a dictatorial regime is an affront to all people who respect the concept of democratic government.

The President has said that we should not be afraid to advocate human rights and democracy in the world's forums. National interests must be recognized and protected, but national ideals also need to be defended. It is one of our national responsibilities to speak for those who cannot speak for themselves. We believe that democracy can best be promoted by example of persuasion. As a nation we must refuse to cooperate and support a government that oppresses its own people. It is our task, and our responsibility, to encourage others in their struggle while at the same time strictly refraining from interfering directly in the domestic affairs of other governments.

My office window looks out over the United Nations Plaza to the United Nations buildings and the East River beyond. I can see the colorful flags of almost 150 nations lining the plaza, together with the beautiful light blue flag of the United Nations itself. It is an impressive sight.

Just on the other side of the river, I can see the smoke of the factories where the work is done that makes it possible for the diplomats of the world to gather to discuss world problems. And I can make out the dim outlines, through the smog, of some of the blighted urban areas of greater New York City, where angry despair rules many lives, and where human rights and dignity are mocked. And I ask myself, what am I doing for those folks?

I know some people in the slums of New York City whose lives are not blighted by their circumstances. They have discovered and kept a larger dream of what it means to be human, and they know that dignity is the right of all persons and all peoples. These are the ones who are working for freedom—in many ways, in many difficult ways. And they are not alone.

All over the world there are people who are working for freedom, for justice, and for peace. Some of them do so in public view, like those of us at the United Nations. But the great majority are never mentioned in the press. Yet it is this great army of freedom fighters, scattered around the world, that finally will bring us significant progress and victory.

I try to look beyond the flags, beyond the U.N. buildings, beyond the East River and Brooklyn, to see the real freedom movement in the world today. I can feel, even in the protocol-inhibited halls of the United Nations, a rising tide of hope across the world today. Humankind was not destined to live forever in the midst of wars and poverty and repression. I believe we can find a better way.

There is a human rights movement in the world today, there is a freedom movement in the world today. It is unorganized, or at least it is not easily identified as one movement. But it is powerful because it is mounted on the wings of hope being born again. It is not the hope of the intellectual, or the diplomat, or of the politician that changes things. It is the hope of the great majority of disinherited and dispossessed, that once set loose will overcome the barrier and shackles that have caused such suffering for so long.●

OF CALIFORNIA

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, for the past 32 years an extraordinary man has served as the pastor of Holy Trinity Church in San Pedro, Calif. Msgr. George M. Gallagher exemplifies the qualities which mark greatness in those who chose a life in the clergy—piety, deep devotion to his chosen vocation, kindness, love for all mankind, and a genuine sense of humility.

What has marked Monsignor Gallagher's relationship with his parish, however, has been the special aspects he personally brings with him. He realizes that happiness and joy are essential to the human spirit. His outgoing Irish wit, personal charm, lively sense of humor, and boundless enthusiasm are infectious. And with those qualities inherent in his effective leadership, Monsignor Gallagher has made Holy Trinity Parish the lively, involved congregation it has been over the years.

Born in Portlaoise, Ireland, on June 9, 1901, George M. Gallagher was raised in nearby Maryborough, both in Leix County. One of nine children of Michael and Mary O'Toole Gallagher, he began his education under the Sisters of the Presentation, and studied under the Christian Brothers at Maryborough and at Rockwell College, Cashel, County Tipperary.

After attending the National University in Dublin, Monsignor Gallagher attended the seminary at St. Patrick's College in Carlow and was ordained into the priesthood on June 12, 1928.

Later that same year, then Father Gallagher was sent from his native Ireland to his first assignment—Immaculate Heart of Mary Parish in Hollywood, Calif. After a trip to Rome and American College, along with a visit with his family in Ireland, Father Gallagher was assigned as an assistant at St. Monica's Parish in Santa Monica. Many members of the entertainment community belonged to St. Monica's, including Leo McLarey, who made the film "Going My Way," and actor Pat O'Brien.

In 1935, Father Gallagher was transferred to St. Mary's Parish in Boyle Heights, in what is now known as East Los Angeles. Along with his regular duties, he worked closely with youth activities and an active parish theatrical group. After another trip to Ireland in 1938, he was assigned to Our Lady of Loretto Parish, where he served for 2 years.

In the spring of 1940, Father Gallagher was appointed as pastor of St. Rose of Lima Parish in Simi, Calif. He served there until 1942, when he assumed the pastorship of St. Gertrude Parish in Bell Gardens.

On November 26, 1946, Holy Trinity Parish in San Pedro was reactivated after 14 years of dormancy, forced by the Depression in 1932. Father Gallagher was appointed pastor of the new parish, which at the time was centered in the vintage 1927 church on O'Farrel Street in San Pedro.

In March of 1950, a groundbreaking ceremony signaled the start of construction of a 12-classroom grammar school. Students were instructed in temporary quarters until 1951, when the building was completed. Holy Trinity Elementary School, with instruction by the Sisters of the Presentation—the same order that taught Father Gallagher as a youngster so many years before—has been an important part of the San Pedro community ever since.

Another important milestone was reached in 1959. Under the able leadership and example of Father Gallagher, Holy Trinity Parish grew stronger and more active. The need for a new church was apparent, and the groundbreaking for the new place of worship began in that year. On Sunday, April 29, 1962 the new church was formally dedicated by His Eminence James Francis Cardinal McIntyre, D.D., the archbishop of the Archdiocese of Los Angeles.

In December, 1968 Pope Paul VI elevated Father Gallagher as a domestic prelate, with the title of "Right Reverend Monsignor." He was formally invested in ceremonies held at Holy Trinity Church on January 22, 1969. Since then, Monsignor Gallagher has continued to serve the San Pedro community as pastor of Holy Trinity Parish.

Mr. Speaker, Holy Trinity Church and its many activities are marked by a very special sense of togetherness. Few congregations of any faith can claim the warmth amply demonstrated by the wide participation in church and community activities there.

In those respects, the parish is a reflection of the man who has led it since its reactivation in 1946. Monsignor Gallagher provides leadership and direction in the most effective way possible—by the example of his own life, he has enriched the lives of countless others in his 50 years in the priesthood.

My wife, Lee, joins me in congratulating Monsignor George M. Gallagher as he celebrates his Golden Anniversary as a priest of the Roman Catholic faith. Through his life's work, his love and concern for young people, and his unselfish acts for the benefits of others, he has earned the respect and affection of men and women of all faiths.●

INDEXING THE INCOME TAX

HON. DOUGLAS WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, I recently received copies of an exchange of correspondence between Mr. John Harrington, a constituent, and Mr. Emil Sunley of the Treasury Department. Mr. Herrington had requested Senator JOHN HEINZ, my predecessor as representative from the 18th Congressional District, to seek some statement of policy on the indexing of the tax system to correct for the effects of inflation. The Treasury Department responded making several arguments against any proposed indexing of the tax system which, I believe, Mr. Herrington addresses very well.

Certainly the need for indexing has been well documented. Higher wages to combat inflation have often pushed wage earners into higher tax brackets. Thus, real income has actually decreased because of larger tax bites associated with higher tax brackets. Government should not be entitled to take advantage of inflation to reap greater tax revenues. Indexing would put a halt to this practice and have the added value of stemming the growth of Government spending.

As a cosponsor of H.R. 11413, a bill that would index the tax system to correct for inflation, I urge my colleagues to read the following letter from the Treasury to Mr. Herrington and Mr. Herrington's reply to this letter:

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D.C., April 14, 1978.

DEAR SENATOR HEINZ: This is in reply to your communication of March 2, 1978, in which you request comments on a letter from Mr. J. D. Herrington of Allison Park, Pennsylvania, who suggests that the income tax rates be tax adjusted for the effects of inflation.

Under any income tax system other than a flat rate system which applies to all income, taxes as a percentage of income, the so-called "effective tax rate", rise along with inflation unless the width of each tax bracket, the size of personal exemptions, and all other fixed dollar amounts are adjusted. However, inflation is only one of two major causes of higher effective tax rates: the other cause is higher levels of real income. Even if there were no inflation, rising real income levels would produce higher effective (and marginal) tax rates over time if there were no changes in the structure or parameters of the tax system.

Automatically adjusting the tax system for inflation is only one possible method of correcting for higher tax rates due to inflation, i.e., indexing the tax system. Periodic, legislated tax reductions are a substitute for indexing the tax system. Indexing automatically distributes the tax gains from inflation. Legislated tax cuts allow the tax increases from inflation to be distributed more selectively based on economic conditions and the perceived needs of different income groups or family compositions. Legislated tax reductions can also be timed to offset economic slowdowns.

Since 1954, the Congress has acted several times to offset the effects of inflation on the tax system. These periodic, legislated tax reductions have been very successful in counteracting the effects of inflation. In fact, in the aggregate these tax cuts have more than offset inflation; they have offset the effects of both inflation and of rising real incomes so that since 1955 Federal individual income tax receipts have remained stable at about 10 percent of personal income. In fact, at and below median levels of family income, legislated tax changes have actually reduced the tax burden since the mid-1950's.

Sincerely,

EMIL M. SUNLEY,
Deputy Assistant Secretary.

JOHN D. HERRINGTON III,
Allison Park, Pennsylvania,
May 3, 1978.

DEAR JOHN: I want to thank you very sincerely for taking the trouble to obtain a response to my comment on income tax indexing from Emil M. Sunley, Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Department. I very much appreciate the extra effort you have taken on this matter.

Mr. Sunley's reply does deserve a response on my part. He points out that the effects of inflation can be handled either by adjusting income tax rates or through indexing as I have suggested. Although agreeing that indexing is an alternative, he seems to prefer the adjustment of tax rates and points out that this is the method that has historically been used by the Treasury Department. While defending the Treasury Department's past actions, I believe he actually makes a very strong case for indexing and the proposal which I made which was "before consideration is given to any of the specific items (in the Administration's proposals) that pertain to individuals, that the concept of income tax indexing must be implemented".

Mr. Sunley's letter would lead the reader to believe that past tax reductions have adequately taken care of the inflation tax on taxpayers. This, of course, is not the case by his own admission when he indicates that these tax reductions have not been uniformly distributed among all taxpayers. Mr. Sunley makes the point that total federal individual income tax receipts have remained stable at approximately 10% since 1955. I am in no position to dispute this fact and will accept it. The problem, however, is that in shifting the tax burden away from one group and toward another, many have had a considerable loss in purchasing power. Since 1955, many of our citizens have not only been exempt from payment of federal income taxes but, in fact, have received direct subsidies from the federal government. This additional burden is being borne by yet another group of taxpayers.

Mr. Sunley also justifies the Treasury Department's action in part by indicating it takes its proper share of real income growth. In an article on inflation in today's Wall Street Journal, it is mentioned that, over the past five years, inflation has risen 45% while average income has risen only 40%. It is obvious there is no real growth here. Let's use these figures in a specific example. If an individual filing a joint return had taxable income of $19,200 five years ago, he would have paid an income tax of $3,260 or 17%.

If his taxable income today had increased by 40% to $26,880, his tax bill would be $5,558 or 20.7%. The 40% increase of $7,680 would carry a tax bite of $2,298 or 30% of the amount of salary increase he received. He would have been left with a 34% increase in his after tax income during a period when inflation increased 45%. It is obvious that this individual who might not even be a middle income taxpayer is losing the battle against inflation. Some who earn less and all who earn more are likewise losing this battle.

I have been paying income taxes for a good many years and whenever the rates have been adjusted, I have never heard that it was being done to compensate for inflation. The reasons have been to prime the pump, to reduce the burden for all taxpayers, or the unspoken but obvious one of political expediency. It does not hold water with me to now see it was done in order to adjust for the impact of inflation.

For many years, the tax writers in Washington have been playing a shell game with the American public. Some win and some lose but nobody really knows which shell the pea is under. The Administration's current proposal on the surface appears to be equitable by dropping all tax brackets by 2 percent but where the pea is being hidden is to change the matter of exemptions and deductions. The granting of the $240 credit as opposed to a $750 deduction provides relief to some taxpayers and additional taxes to others. What the right hand giveth is a 2 percent tax reduction, the left hand taketh away through other means. I believe that the Administration is finally owning up to the fact that no taxpayer with a taxable income in excess of $25,000 will receive relief for inflation or anything else by way of the current proposal.

My greatest concern for this country is the deincentivization of our most skilled and dedicated citizens. I am most concerned that our government is following an irreversible course of taking the fruits of those who contribute the most and sharing in unilaterally with many who contribute very little. It is time to take the pea out from under the shell. The first step is to index taxes which will allow many Americans to know and understand, for the first time, what share of the tax burden they are being asked to pay (or not pay). Once this has been accomplished, then consideration can be given to additional modifications within our tax system.

I am extremely sorry that this letter is so long but I don't know how to make my point in fewer words. I strongly urge you turn it over to one of your staff members for their follow-up and that you will be guided in the deliberations ahead by their findings.

Best personal regards,

J. D. HERRINGTON.●

THE RIGHTS OF VISUAL ARTISTS

HON. ROBERT F. DRINAN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. DRINAN. Mr. Speaker, last July 13, I introduced a bill (H.R. 8261) to expand the rights of visual artists. This measure would amend the copyright statute to protect so-called moral rights for the first time in American law. Such rights are well known in most foreign countries, although the American courts have steadfastly refused to recognize them.

The moral rights of artists are a bundle of legally enforceable proscriptions which seek to protect the personality and esthetic qualities of art works. They are not proprietary interests such as the copyright. While moral rights are defined variously in different countries, they generally encompass the following: First, right of authorship (to require the owner of the work to identify properly the creator of the work); second, the right to prevent distortion, mutilation, or other alteration; and third, the right to prevent a nonauthorized use of the work which would injure the honor or reputation of the artist.

Recently Tad Crawford, a legal authority on the rights of artists, reviewed the moral rights question in the April 1978, edition of the American Artist. I insert the monograph in the RECORD for the examination of my colleagues:

MORAL RIGHTS AND THE ARTIST

(By Tad Crawford)

Why does the question of moral rights seem so controversial in the United States when other countries accept them as a matter of course?

Many American artists may simply assume that even after sale they still have a right to be credited as the creators of their art and should still have control over how their art is displayed. These are the most important components of what is called droit moral: moral rights widely recognized abroad. In fact, the cases discussed in this article illustrate that the protections for the American artist are limited and often unsatisfactory. Many artists groups have recognized moral rights as an important issue and demanded the enactment of legislation to guarantee this protection.

Now Congressman Robert F. Drinan (D., Mass.) has sponsored an imaginative and exciting bill which would provide moral rights for artists in the United States. Introduced on July 13, 1977, his bill, H.R. 8261, the "Visual Artists Moral Rights" Amendment of 1977, proposes to amend the copyright law as follows.

"Independently of the author's copyright in a pictorial, graphic, or sculptural work, the author or the author's legal representative shall have the right, during the life of the author and fifty years after the author's death, to claim authorship of such work and to object to any distortion, multilation, or other alteration thereof, and to enforce any other limitation recorded in the Copyright Office that would prevent prejudice to the author's honor or reputation."

Copyright, the power to control reproduction and other uses of a work, is a property right. Moral rights are best described as rights of personality. Even if the artist has sold his work and the accompanying copyright, he would still retain his rights of personality. Thus moral rights connect an artist to his work even in the absence of property rights.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT PROTECTION

Drinan's bill follows closely the language of the Berne Copyright Convention. The recent revision of our copyright law has increased the likelihood that the United States could join this Convention and gain greater worldwide protection for the creative works of our citizens.

One stumbling block to our becoming a signatory, however, is the asbence under our law of any moral rights provisions. Some legal commentators have argued that American laws relating to libel, right to privacy, and unfair competition (in which one competitor has confused the public as to whose product is being sold) amount to a satisfactory equivalent of moral rights. The better view, however, is that this melange does not at all approach the protections offered to creative persons and their work under specially designed and moral rights provisions.

To understand what the reality of Drinan's bill might ultimately prove to be, it is helpful to examine a number of European and American cases illustrating the effects moral rights could have if enacted in the United States.

RIGHT OF PATERNITY

The first moral right listed in Drinan's bill is that of the artist "to claim authorship of such work." Known as the right of paternity, this would change the holding of a famous American case involving the artist Alberto Vargas and Esquire magazine. Vargas created a distinctive series of drawings of women over which Esquire acquired complete ownership by contract. For more than five years, Esquire had given Vargas credit as creator of the illustrations, although the contract itself did not provide for him to receive any such credit. After Vargas and Esquire had a falling out in 1946, the magazine changed the title on the remaining drawings it owned to "Esquire Girls" and gave no credit line at all to Vargas. Vargas sued but the court decided that Vargas could not claim an implied right to receive authorship credit, because the contract specifically transferred all rights to Esquire. It stated: "What plaintiff in reality seeks is a change in the law in this country to conform to that of certain other countries . . . we are not disposed to make any new law in this respect."

Drinan's bill would also prevent enforcement of a contractual provision by which an artist agrees to create work under a pseudonym. In a French case decided in 1967, for example, a painter named Guille agreed to deliver to his dealer his entire output for ten years. These works would either be unsigned by Guille or signed under a pseudonym. The court held the contract invalid, since it violated the painter's right of paternity.

One limit to the right of paternity, however, is shown in a bizarre 1977 case involving the Surrealist Giorgio deChirico. He filed suit in France when a painting titled The Ghost and attributed to him was displayed at the Musee des Arts Decroatifs. He claimed that the attribution was false and demanded the painting be destroyed. The court insisted that he pay an expert's fee to examine the painting for authenticity. When deChirico refused to do this and failed to prove by other means that the painting was a fake, the court not only refused to grant the relief requested but also required deChirico to pay 50,000 francs to the woman who owned the painting. The right of paternity would permit an artist to prevent false attribution of painting, but it would not allow the artist to stop the exhibition of a painting correctly attributed to him.

RIGHT OF INTEGRITY

The next moral right in Drinan's bill would guarantee the artist the right "to object to any distortion, mutilation, or other alteration thereof. . . ." Known as the right of integrity, this is illustrated by a leading French case involving six panels of a refrigerator painted by Bernard Buffet for auction by a charity. It was Buffet's intention that the refrigerator be exhibited as a whole. Accordingly, he only signed one of the six panels. Within six months of the first auction, however, one of the panels was offered for sale at a second auction under the description of a painting on metal by Buffet. He brought suit to prevent the sale of the panel separately and to have the entire work returned to him. In 1962 the court upheld him to the extent that it refused to allow the panels to be sold separately in either a public or private sale, but the private owner was allowed to keep the work. Buffet also received one franc as a symbolic vindication, the right to have the court's decision published in three art journals of his choice at the defendant's expense, and the court costs.

On the other hand, artists in the United States have not been notably successful in preventing the circulation and display of their work in altered or distorted form. Carl Andre, for example, lent a work to the Whitney Museum in New York City for its 1976 exhibition, "Two Hundred Years of American Sculpture." Because the work was displayed near a bay window and a fire exit, Andre claimed these distractions distorted it and withdrew it from the exhibition. The Whitney Museum simply substituted another work by Andre from its permanent collection. Andre objected again, this time because the substitute work had been misinstalled by placing rubber backings under the copper floor pieces. He found, however, that he had no recourse against the owner of the work, whether the owner was a private person or an institution.

In another well publicized case, the city of Los Angeles has refused to maintain properly a sculpture titled Triforium which it commissioned for $925,000 from Joseph Young. The three towers of Triforium sweep upward from six arched support legs. Its height is 60 feet, and it is equipped with speakers to broadcast live musical performances and with 1494 multicolored glass prisms for light shows. The large size of this sculpture is suitable for its placement in a downtown mall bordered by government buildings.

However, tempers have flared over Triforium's aesthetic value and the fact it substantially overran its 1970 cost estimate of $325,000. In 1975 its creator, Joseph Young, was barred from access to Triforium. He claims that the failure of the city administration to maintain the sculpture properly has crippled it to the point where it functions at only 1/100th of its capability. Young feels the light shows in no way reflect the potential of Triforium and that playing canned rather than live music is also a distortion. "The city has culturally vandalized my concepts," Young states. "Truly, the public has never had a fair chance to experience what Triforium can do." Interestingly enough, if the State of California commissions a sculpture, it is protected under the state's 1976 1% for art law, which provides for consultation with "the artist to insure that each work of art acquired pursuant to this chapter is properly maintained and is not artistically altered in any manner without the consent of the artist."

RIGHT TO PROPERTY

It is clear that in the United States nothing prevents the owner of an artwork from destroying it completely. For example, in 1937 a mural painter named Alfred Crimi was selected by competition to create a fresco mural painting 35' x 26' for the Rutgers Presbyterian Church in New York City. The contract stated that the mural would be permanently affixed to the wall and that the church would also own the copyright. In 1938 the mural was completed by the artist, but already some members of the congregation objected to it on the grounds that the degree to which Christ's chest was exposed emphasized his physical rather than his spiritual qualities. This protesting segment apparently increased so that in 1946 the mural was painted over in the course of redecorating the church.

Crimi sued, demanding that the mural either be restored, removed from the wall at the church's expense and given to him, or that he receive an award of damages as compensation. The court held against Crimi, stating, "The time for the artist to have reserved any rights was when he and his attorney participated in the drawing of the contract with the church." In the view of the court, the mural was merely property and could be destroyed at its owner's whim.

However, it is not clear that the right of integrity, if enacted, would prevent an owner from destroying a mural or other artwork. In 1973 French artist Jean Dubuffet contracted with renault, the state-owned automobile company, to construct a 2,000 square yard abstract sculpture at the company's headquarters on the outskirts of Paris. Dubuffet constructed a model for a sculpture which would be placed in the company's courtyard and provide leisure and recreation for the more than 1,500 employees. The model was approved in September 1974, by Pierre Dreyfus, then President of Renault, and construction began. However, Dreyfus retired in the middle of 1975, and his successor, Bernard Vernier-Palliez, decided that "the automobile business has nothing to do with art." The project, approximately halfway toward completion, was halted. Dubuffet, although he had been paid his full fee of $80,000, brought suit to force Renault to permit him to complete the work. He even offered to use his own funds to finance the completion. The lower court found in favor of Renault, but the appellate court reversed and ordered that the work in progress be preserved until a still higher court could finally decide whether the right of integrity will apply to Dubuffet's case. So it is unclear for the moment whether the right of integrity will protect a publicly displayed work from destruction. It would seem likely that the right of integrity will not protect a privately displayed work from a similar fate, but this will also remain unclear until cases are decided in this regard.

RIGHT OF HONOR

The next moral right provided in Drinan's bill would permit enforcement of "any other limitation recorded in the Copyright Office that would prevent prejudice to the author's honor or reputation." For example, if an artist indicated in the records of the Copyright Office that his art should never be exhibited with the work of Soviet artists or used in any other works favorably portraying the Soviet Union, his work could not be used in a film praising the accomplishments of Soviet rule. This would be true even if the copyright had gone into the public domain so that the work could be freely copied by anyone. This right will clearly need more definition, since too extensive limitations could prove unfair to the owner of the work or violate free speech privileges.

For example, the artist could not validly record in the Copyright Office a limitation that the work never be criticized publicly. Whenever art is exhibited to the public, critics have the protection of the First Amendment in giving their honest opinions about its merit. If the boundaries of fair comment are exceeded by a critic, such as by falsely attacking the artist's private life, an action for libel can be brought for injury to reputation.

RIGHTS OF DISCLOSURE AND WITHDRAWAL

Drinan's bill does not provide for the moral rights of disclosure and withdrawal. The right of disclosure gives the artist the absolute right to decide when a work is finished and ready to be revealed to the public. While it may be argued that our copyright laws provide similar protection, it is not clear that copyright or other laws would, for example, protect unfinished artworks from the demands of a bankrupt artist's creditors or from a spouse in divorce proceedings in a community property state. The right of withdrawal exists in France in relation to literary works, but not artworks. It permits the author to withdraw from the public, as long as the author fully compensates the present owner for any losses suffered. It does not ever seem to be used, so proposing it as part of a United States bill would be a futile gesture.

The Drinan bill will create moral rights that last for the artist's lifetime plus another 50 years. This is the same term as copyright protection under the copyright revision act which took effect January 1, 1978. Moral rights is a country such as France, however, are perpetual. Also, the designation of the artist's "legal representative" as the party to enforce such rights after the artist's death may well be insufficient, since heirs and perhaps the courts should also be given rights.

Another important point is that the Drinan bill does not indicate whether moral rights can be transferred by the artist. If the artist could assign his moral rights in such a way that he would be unable to exercise them, their value would be greatly lessened. The intention of the bill needs to be clarified here. Also, the Drinan bill purposely deals only with moral rights for creators of works which are "pictorial, graphic, or sculptural," but the appropriateness of moral rights for other art forms will have to be taken up in congressional hearings.

REMEDIES FOR VIOLATIONS

If such hearings are held, the issue of remedies for violations of moral rights will also have to be resolved. The present bill proposes an amendment to the copyright laws. Drinan states, however, "My bill would not require that the work first be copyrighted before the moral right attaches." This means that the remedies available for copyrighted works under the copyright law might not serve to protect the artist asserting moral rights for an uncopyrighted work. The copyright law provides for damages, injunctions, court costs, and attorney's fees if a copyright infringement claim is successfully prosecuted. Should the artist bringing suit on a moral rights claim have similar rights? For example, should the artist claiming a work has been mutilated have a right to receive damages as well as a right to have the work restored? And should our moral rights provision give that ultimate relief which the French courts denied to Bernard Buffet: return of the artwork itself?

Many obstacles must be overcome before moral rights will be enacted into law for United States artists. The present bill must be refined and clarified in many important respects. After that, a major political effort must be undertaken by artists across the country to rally support for moral rights.

But Congressman Drinan must be praised for his foresight and initiative in introducing the Visual Artists Moral Rights Amendment of 1977. For, as Drinan stated in his remarks in The Congressional Record, "If the Congress fails to enact positive, effective statutes to protect the rights of artists, the United States, with all its wealth, power, and achievements, will be judged, at best, a second rate civilization." ●

OSHA TOPPLES IN FOURTH AMENDMENT FIGHT

HON. GEORGE HANSEN

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, the Supreme Court decision banning OSHA inspections without a search warrant is a great victory for privacy and freedom in this Nation.

The Supreme Court ruled 5 to 3 that Government agents checking for safety and health hazards may not make spot checks of businesses without a warrant. The Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) since its inception in 1970 has long been an irritating violator of fourth amendment rights of the Nation's farmers and businessmen.

It took the courage and determination of one small businessman to stand up to a runaway bureaucracy indulging wholesale in the unreasonable searches and seizures prohibited by the Constitution. Bill Barlow, a Pocatello, Idaho, businessman, in the face of possible jail and cost of well over $100,000 proved his point in the gallant fashion of American patriots, and all who value liberty owe him a great debt for this pioneering effort in basic citizens rights.

The performance of the Barlow attorneys, Runft and Longeteig of Boise, and their legal colleagues on similar cases across the country was most effective and provided a long string of victories going into the Supreme Court.

Although it will take some study to determine the full implications of the decision, the preservation by the court of the separation of powers doctrine protecting citizens from the tyranny of any one branch of Government through checks and balances is a great victory.

The Barlow decision is an important point in American history because it sets a constructive precedent for necessary protective guidelines for citizen rights in the face of Government activities. Heretofore, the businessman and farmer have been the victims of a recent trend in reverse justice where the citizen is assumed guilty until he can prove his innocence.

The Barlow court ruling places the burden of proof back on the Government where it belongs. OSHA can now come to inspect as before but the businessman can demand that they have a search warrant properly obtained from a magistrate, and the search warrant itself can be challenged by the citizen if he wishes to question the ground upon which the warrant was issued—thus the burden of proof rests on the Government as was previously stated.

All citizens and especially those vulnerable to Government inspections should know their rights and not allow themselves to be improperly victimized by an overly aggressive bureaucracy no matter how well meaning its intentions.

The Barlow case began when an inspector from the Labor Department's Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) appeared some 3 years ago at Bill Barlow's shop in Pocatello for one of their routine unannounced inspections. Bill refused to allow the inspector to proceed citing the fourth amendment to the Constitution which prohibits unreasonable searches of private property. The inspector was told he needed a search warrant in order to proceed.

Several months elapsed before OSHA returned, this time with a court order to let the inspector in. In the meantime, Mr. Barlow had contacted me regarding the denial of the inspector and to request assistance in his confrontation with the Government. I suggested that he obtain legal counsel knowledgeable in this area of Government activities and who might have some crusading zeal toward the case.

As OSHA pressed the confrontation with the court order, and Mr. Barlow had not yet made a legal selection, in a quick move to preserve his position, I introduced him to Boise Attorney John Runft, who had previously assisted me very capably in key legal matters involving the Government. Mr. Runft moved swiftly to prevent a contempt-of-court citation and possible jail term for Mr. Barlow and requested and received a hearing on the case before a three-judge constitutional panel convened by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals out of San Francisco for the U.S. District Court of Idaho.

The Barlow court, comprised of the Chief Judge of the Idaho District Court and two circuit court judges including the senior member, agreed with Barlow's contention that the inspection authority of the OSHA law violated the fourth amendment to the U.S. Constitution. This decision, of course, would have put OSHA out of business and the Department of Labor immediately appealed the matter to the U.S. Supreme Court. This was the exciting and spectacular beginning of a long and costly fight to win final victory in the Supreme Court.

It was then necessary to encourage similar opposition and court tests throughout the United States to broaden our base of support and further validate our position.

Such strategy was not without risk in that it was vital that all such confrontations be done so as to stand before the Supreme Court with the best possible record of lower court victories. My office served as a clearinghouse for this national effort coordinating OSHA complaints and inspection rejections throughout the Nation with the necessary legal counsel provided by key figures like John Runft, Dallas attorney Robert Rader who had actually won the first fourth amendment case against OSHA, and Atlanta attorney McNeil Stokes who had earlier brought OSHA before the Supreme Court on other grounds.

A splendid string of victories was thereby achieved in some 22 State and Federal courts leading up to the final victory before the Nation's highest court on May 23, 1978.

Such a massive nationwide legal effort demanded a serious fundraising program in addition to the private resources of Bill Barlow and the handful of other brave challengers across the land. I already began "Operation Paul Revere" through my office to alert citizens of their constitutional rights when approached by the American Conservative Union to head a national "stop OSHA" campaign which was to provide educational services to citizens and lawmakers and raise funds for the legal and legislative fights.

In order to incorporate the strongest possible base of support, names of those inspected by OSHA were obtained from the Government under the Freedom of Information Act and contacted for support.

In the meantime, I organized an independent group called the Committee for Constitutional Challenge to OSHA (CCCO), largely Idaho based, as a proper repository of funds and as an additional fundraising device. The funds raised by ACU, some $60,000 thus far, were periodically transferred to CCCO where the total accumulation has thus far been well over $100,000 toward funding the fight—a fight which has now cost approximately $160,000.

It is anticipated that the effort will be fully funded in the near future and many thanks go out to citizen action groups such as those directing the CCCO, the ACU, and the many business and agriculture associations whose membership have given generously and enthusiastically to this basic philosophical struggle for citizens rights.

The final effort came in assisting attorney Runft in accumulating the necessary legal expertise and support to assure the best possible presentation before the Supreme Court. A broad range of amici curiae—friends of the court—were assembled even though the number of participants were limited to carefully keep the matter apart from the heavy hand of politics and special interest pressure and on the stage of reason and constitutional judgment. The research and strong briefs submitted by Mr. Runft and the amici curiae were obviously vital in winning the necessary support where the decision would not eventually be unanimous.

The polished appearance of Attorney Runft bolstered by his staff and a strong array of amici and supported by the prayers and assistance of freedom-loving citizens across the Nation presented a classic chapter in American history. And yet the most touching part of the whole drama was the appearance in the audience of the Supreme Court that cold day in Washington, January 9, 1978, of an average citizen from a small town in the West, a church man, a family man, a stalwart in his community, Bill Barlow, his wife, five sons, two daughters, and other members of the family.

Here was a man, fighting for a principle, strongly supported by his family, who withstood the threat of jail and an impossible financial burden to plead his cause and the cause of all Americans before the Nation's highest court—and win.

OSHA—A WEAK LINK IN WORKERS' SAFETY

Insurance, not OSHA, holds this key to workers' health and safety.

The Nation's employers may be annoyed or irritated with OSHA but it is the insurance companies which they really fear. While the Government can fine or impose arbitrary and burdensome compliance costs on businessmen, insurance companies can charge high rates for coverage or deny protection which can actually put people out of business.

A business must have liability coverage and workmen's compensation. A poor history of employee safety and health can drive insurance rates prohibitively high or even prevent acquisition of such protection. Thus, the businessman has his strongest motivation for providing the safest possible workplace because of the commercial incentives built into the insurance he must carry, not to mention the vulnerability of business to lawsuits and criminal prosecution for neglect, desirability of a good public image, and the continued need to comply with labor contracts and State and local building, health, electrical, and other licensing provisions and codes. OSHA has added little to this but additional paperwork and arbitrary inspections, penalties and requirements.

A study of safety statistics show that prior to OSHA, conditions were continually improving, but since OSHA, a leveling out has occurred. Unfortunately, the imposition of the Federal Government through OSHA may have caused the traditional safety monitors to get out of the way and leave it to OSHA which has spectacularly bungled the job. The Nation's largest safety and health scandals in past months have been in areas under OSHA jurisdiction such as the Kepone situation in Virginia, the failure of the scaffolding fatal to 52 in West Virginia, and the continuous grain elevator explosions rocking the country. In fact, there is some question regarding OSHA practices in grain elevators as to whether their requirements are not only ineffective but actually creating "dust bombs," a consideration now under study by the U.S. Comptroller General at my request.●

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO THE NORTH JERSEY TRAINING SCHOOL AT TOTOWA, STATE OF NEW JERSEY, UPON THE GOLDEN ANNIVERSARY OF ITS FOUNDING

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, a half century ago the North Jersey Training School was constructed by the State of New Jersey in the Borough of Totowa in my congressional district for the purpose of providing training for God's special young girls between the ages of 12 and 20 whose mental development required special care and guidance in order to give them the broadest possible educational experience and help them participate in the mainstream of our society.

This weekend, June 3, 4, and 5, administrators of the school are holding an open house and welcoming visitors to help celebrate the 50th anniversary of the North Jersey Training School at Totowa and I know you and our colleagues here in the Congress will want to join with me in extending our warmest greetings and felicitations to the superintendent, the Honorable Denis J. Buttimore, Ph. D.; members of the Board of Trustees, 655 members of the faculty and staff, and the young lady students and residents upon this golden anniversary celebration. Several events for this auspicious occasion are planned to focus attention on the many activities designed to provide excellent care for their residents including an annual open house sale of crafts and plants in the vocational building, school and the greenhouse; Ecumenical Chapel Commemorative Service; 50th Anniversary Carnival; and Open House Visitation Day.

Mr. Speaker, the North Jersey Training School, a State facility constructed in 1927 and officially opened in 1928, is located in the Borough of Totowa, County of Passaic, on the Minnisink Road, between Little Falls and Paterson and is comprised of approximately 250 acres of land. For the past 50 years, the school has served the needs of the developmentally disabled of all ages. In addition to maintaining adequate and wholesome living facilities and appropriate medical care, the training school has established programs in academic, prevocational and vocational training, recreation, occupational therapy, physical therapy, and speech therapy. Special services include psychological and social counseling, volunteer, Girl Scout and Foster Grandparent programs.

With your permission I would like to insert at this point in our historic journal of Congress descriptive background information on the most comprehensive facilities of the North Jersey Training School at Totowa which was presented to me by the assistant supervisor of educational programs, the Honorable Arnold R. Profeta, Ed. D, as follows:

INFORMATION

TRAINING PROGRAM

The major objective of the training program is to provide educational and social experiences for those who some day may return to a useful place in society and for those who will find their permanent home within the institution.

Careful individual admission classification as to treatment and training is followed by periodic revision and re-adjustment in the training program whenever necessary without interfering either with the welfare of the individual or the group in which she is placed.

COMPREHENSIVE FACILITIES

Originally the Training School offered institutional facilities primarily for higher grade retarded girls, but due to changing community needs the school now accepts all levels of mental retardates over five years of age; educable, trainable and care cases, including ambulatory and non-ambulatory as residents.

Educable residents receive pre-placement training which is provided by employing in part classroom techniques as well as on-the-job training methods. Trainable residents receive occupational therapy and basic handwork instruction in addition to participation in the institutional job training program; while nontrainable residents are provided protective care and supervision as needed.

In the school building you will observe classes in sewing, weaving, beauty culture, domestic science as well as primary academic and handicraft classes.

ON THE JOB TRAINING

After completion of formal school training the residents participate in on-the-job training program within the institution performing such diversified activities as baby care, food preparation and serving, sewing and mending, hospital aide, laundering and housework.

Gradually as the residents manifest proficiency in these areas they are provided with the opportunity, as part of their training, of performing domestic work one or two days a week in nearby homes, receiving fees for such services. Eventually such training leads toward temporary community placement with social supervision and, if successful, permanent return to the community.

This entire process of acquiring specific skills and gradual acceptance of responsibility is a part of an integrated program designed to provide a type of training which will enab'e our residents to function at their highest level of achievement as members of a community, whether it is within or outside of the institution.

OUR NURSERY UNIT

Our Nursery which was opened in 1953 and accommodates 250 very young mental retardates of both sexes, the majority of whom are multiply handicapped.

The Nursery building, which is completely air conditioned, consists of thirty rooms and three wing wards, equipped with special ultra-violet ray glass windows. You may observe the central oxygen unit, the stainless steel equipped kitchen, a laundry processing center that handles one ton of linen daily, a modern pharmacy, complete laboratory facilities, an indoor playroom and fully equipped outdoor playyard.

OTHER POINTS OF INTEREST

We have a Hospital, Vocational Building, Greenhouse, Auditorium, Gymnasium, Chapel and Commissary. Nearby is our recreational area featuring a skating rink, a swimming pool, playground and Athletic field.

Across the square from the School is our dining hall and cafeteria, from the central kitchen are fed over 700 girls and approximately 100 staff personnel who reside on the grounds. This is undoubtedly one of our busiest areas in the campus.

Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to call to your attention and seek national recognition of the outstanding service provided by the administrators and faculty of the North Jersey Training School over the past 50 years. Their dedication and devotion, motivated by the warmth and indepth feeling of caring, have provided new horizons and lasting renewals to the young lady students and residents who have sought their training. They have brought hope and promise and helped improve the quality of life for so many of our young people. We do indeed salute the North Jersey Training School at Totowa upon the celebration of their golden anniversary.●

STATEMENT OF MARLO THOMAS IN SUPPORT OF FUNDS FOR SCHOOL LIBRARIES AND LEARNING RESOURCES

HON. JOHN BRADEMAS

OF INDIANA

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, one of the best known actresses in our country is Miss Marlo Thomas.

But Miss Thomas is more than an actress. She is a producer, a teacher, and a citizen actively concerned about some of the problems that face the people of our country.

A few weeks ago, Miss Thomas testified before the Labor-HEW Appropriations Subcommittee of the House of Representatives in support of adequate funds for the school library program under title IV–B of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the administration requested $167,600,000 for ESEA title IV–B for the fiscal year 1979, an amount identical to the appropriation for fiscal year 1978, and therefore a reduction of funds in real terms in view of both the need and inflation.

Miss Thomas urged in her appearance before the subcommittee that an additional $30 million be appropriated for the school library program and cited by way of justifying this request the widespread success of a record which she and others created entitled, "Free To Be You and Me," a record which has stimulated other teaching resources that have been most effectively used across the country.

I am pleased to note that the Labor-HEW Appropriations Subcommittee has recommended $175 million for this title and I want to commend Miss Thomas for the interest she has shown in encouraging Congress to vote much needed funds for one of the most successful of all programs of Federal assistance to our schools and libraries.

At this point I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to insert at this point in the RECORD the text of Marlo Thomas' testimony of April 12, 1978 before the subcommittee:

STATEMENT OF MARLO THOMAS

Mr. Chairman, members of the Subcommittee, I am Marlo Thomas, I am an actress and a producer and a graduate teacher. I am very grateful for this opportunity to testify regarding appropriations for the Elementary and Secondary Education Act. My particular interest today is the appropriation for Title IV–B of that Act, regarding funding for school libraries and learning resources.

The Administration has committed itself to new educational programs, with special emphasis on developing basic skills for younger children. Toward that end, significant increases have been requested for many educational programs.

However, no increase has been requested to enable expansion of school library resources acquisitions—and I would like to tell you why that concerns me particularly.

In 1974, I gathered together some colleagues in the entertainment industry and we created a record called "Free To Be You and Me." We were motivated by a desire to do something entertaining and fun for children, which would also stimulate a rethinking of traditional sex-stereotyped roles for men and women.

I produced that record, and it was a labor of love. The many artists involved worked for the lowest conceivable rates, because they cared about children. We had all seen what sex stereotyping had done to distort the lives of men and women when we were growing up. We had lived through an era when people were locked up by public expectation into tight, little roles, a situation which repressed individual talent and destroyed individual dreams, depriving our country of vast human resources.

We wanted to change that situation. And we used the way we knew best—writing; composing; singing; telling jokes—to make our point.

All the profits of the record went to the Ms. Foundation, which supports programs in non-sexist education. And our success went beyond anybody's wildest dreams.

We ended up with a gold record, a book based on the record, an Emmy-award winning television special, an audio-visual kit which is used over and over again in thousands of schools. "Free To Be You and Me" was grabbed up by educators and included in school curricula all over the country, because teachers need materials; they need multimedia materials; they need new ideas all the time; and the school libraries are the chief resource centers to fill that need.

In 1978, 167.5 million dollars was appropriated for funding of the school library program (ESEA IV–B). I would like to see that appropriation, which supports acquisitions for 16,000 school districts, increased by at least 30 million dollars. That is a modest sum in view of the great need, but it would help to make the market for ideas what I believe it should be—a buyer's market.

The buyer—in this case, the curriculum programmer and the school library—should have as many ideas to choose from as possible. The richer that market is, the more competition there is among creative people to provide ideas for it. And the more competition there is among creative people, the greater the chance of producing something really excellent for our children to learn by.

In a changing society, in a nation currently and constantly discovering its variety, what is good for children today may not be good for them tomorrow. Therefore, schools must have the money to update their collections when necessary. Although our basic values may remain the same, the way we teach them is constantly changing. The idea of individual liberty, for example, has as strong a hold on our people today as it did in 1776. But the way we teach it, the tools we use, changes as media technology develops.

That means that the need for new materials is ever-present.

If we cease to feel the need, then we have ceased to acknowledge change—and then we're in trouble, as a society.

The whole entertainment industry is set up to stave off that kind of trouble. The dynamics of our business make us a force that just naturally fights stagnation. Our stock-in-trade is new ideas. What we do in television and film, in recording and publishing, is to constantly strive to know what will be great for the public—tomorrow.

Now, the incentive to allocate venture capital to produce something for the school market is not just created by the producer, who may be mad for a new idea, but by the prospective receptivity in the market itself.

We the people who developed "Free To Be You and Me," for example, eventually had to funnel our ideas through a complex network of packagers and distributors, who would agree to market our concept only because they thought there was someone out there to buy it.

That means that when you give the market more money, you create an incentive to both the creative people, and to the companies who bring their ideas to the public, to compete for the market. The best way to maximize creative competition, to ensure the widest possible choice and therefore to stimulate excellence, to encourage the media industry to allocate more venture capital for more new ideas for children, is to give the ultimate buyer—the school library—more buying power.

Allocating extra dollars for those acquisitions under Title IV–B would create this chain of incentives.

We know from a survey of 24,000 teachers that instructional materials organize 95% of classroom time. We know from other studies that children learn best when the same material is presented to them through a variety of educational media. So we know that the best way to teach, in a multimedia culture, is by having the books and the records and the audio-visual cassettes and the closed circuit TV materials on hand in the school, and particularly, in the school library.

I ask you, therefore, to consider increasing an appropriation which the Administration has not asked you to increase, but which I believe cannot be held at static levels when other school costs are rising so dramatically. And in this request, I feel confident that I represent not only myself but large numbers of colleagues and competitors in the creative community, who should be encouraged to apply their wit and their style and their variegated talents to producing a wider and wider choice of exciting materials for our children.

Thank you.●

FINAL REGULATION ISSUED BY DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

HON. TOM HAGEDORN

OF MINNESOTA

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. HAGEDORN. Mr. Speaker, on March 7 of this year, I introduced legislation which would limit the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to restrict or prohibit the use of nitrates or nitrites as preservatives in meat products for a period of 2 years. This legislation was necessitated by a threat that a total ban would result from the USDA's request to the industry to prove that bacon could be produced without the formation of a confirmable level of nitrosamines by the March 17 deadline.

Now, just 2 months later, the Department of Agriculture has issued a final regulation which totally prohibits the use of nitrates and lowers the level of ingoing sodium nitrite to 120 parts per million (ppm) plus 550 parts per million sodium ascorbate or sodium erythrobate.

While this 120–550 formula appears to be in accordance with the request of the bacon-producing industry, the final regulation, in essence, is a sugar-coated apple with a rotten core. This regulation if allowed to be promulgated as proposed, would have a devastating effect on both large and small producers with secondary spillover effects felt by hog producers and consumers.

The industry has been working in cooperation with the USDA since 1971 in an attempt to lower the level of nitrosamine formation and voluntarily invested huge sums of money to resolve this problem. I therefore question why the USDA felt compelled to implement such a stringent regulation in light of the many unknown factors yet to be solved. Furthermore in the press release issued on Monday, May 15, Ms. Carol Foreman stated that this action was developed after analyzing a substantial volume of data on bacon and the effects of nitrite and nitrate in the formation of nitrosamines, including the study undertaken by the Secretary's expert panel on nitrites and nitrosamines. May I respectfully point out that recommendation 5 of the final report of the expert panel reads:

For any product where carcinogenic nitrosamines are formed during processing or preparation for cooking or eating, the nitrosamine content should be closely monitored and reduced to an undetectable level as rapidly as possible; e.g., within 3 years.

However, the final regulation gives the industry only until June 15 to comply, although actual in-plant inspection will not begin until August 15. To me, there is a significant time difference between 1 to 3 months and 3 years.

Prior to the issuance of this regulation, all industrial and governmental tests were conducted primarily with bacon taken from the grocery shelf. Although the reason is not yet known, there is evidence that nitrites have a decreasing life concentration. Therefore, bacon that has been manufactured and shipped to the store has a lower level of nitrite residual than does bacon freshly processed at the plant. With the higher concentration in the plant also comes a higher probability that the level of nitrosamine formation will exceed the arbitrarily set limit of 10 ppb.

Furthermore, I feel that the economic impact statement which accompanied this regulation failed to consider several pertinent issues. Once a bacon sample has been found to contain confirmable levels of nitrosamines, the regulation states that all bacon in the producing plant and all future production will be retained until the plant can successfully produce five consecutive normal sized lots without the formation of confirmable levels of nitrosamines. What the impact statement failed to consider was the fact that few processing plants have the financial protection needed to survive retention of their product nor do they have the capacity to store their product for any length of time.

Finally, the regulation states that the USDA will collect samples of bacon from the plant and will analyze for levels of nitrosamines by the thermal energy analyzer (TEA). However, neither the regulation nor the impact statement mention the exorbitant cost and limited availability of the TEA to private industry. In fact, rough estimates indicate that of the approximately 850 processing plants in the United States, 3 plants have limited availability to a TEA and 1 plant has a TEA on order. This leaves the majority of processing plants vulnerable to Government inspectors and their laboratories. What happens is a policy of corrective medicine as opposed to preventive medicine.

For the above-mentioned reasons I have requested Secretary of Agriculture Bergland to rescind this regulation in lieu of a modified proposal. I sincerely feel that the Secretary did not fully realize the devastating impact this regulation would have on the industry.●

FEDERAL GUN CONTROLS BY REGULATORY BURGLARY

HON. GEORGE HANSEN

OF IDAHO

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, Thursday, May 18, 1978, before the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Crime, I registered the strongest possible opposition to the proposed regulations affecting firearms by the U.S. Treasury Department's Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms (BATF). Joining me was Congressman STEVE SYMMS of Idaho's First District who I invited to show the unity of Idahoans against the BATF proposals. We both noted that hundreds of letters from Idaho and around the Nation have been received protesting the Bureau's proposed action.

Both Idaho Congressmen have joined some 150 other Members of this House as sponsors of legislation declaring that the BATF is exceeding its jurisdiction in proposing such regulations. It is indeed a serious situation when a group of bureaucrats in an agency attempt to initiate such far-reaching policies without specific authorization by the Congress. And yet, more and more we are seeing Government decisionmaking handled by nonelected officials beyond the reach of the people.

Congress and not BATF has the authority to enact laws and I very strongly urge my colleagues to reinforce through timely action against the proposed BATF regulations, the principle of Government by the people rather than by bureaucrats and the principle of controlling crime rather than citizens' rights.

Frustrated Federal bureaucrats who have had little success in Congress with strong Federal gun control proposals seem to be moving to the back door approach and they must be stopped.

One way or another it looks like the Federal Government is determined to regulate America's hunters and gun owners.

Under the proposed rules, among other things, all licensed manufacturers will be required to submit a quarterly report of firearms manufactured. The licensed manufacturers, importers, and dealers must submit to the Bureau a quarterly report of firearms dispositions.

No matter how you word it, it still amounts to gun control. During the last session of Congress, gun control legislation was defeated. Now the administration is trying to make an end run and, in effect, require registration without congressional approval.

Due to the scope and extensive public interest generated in the proposals published in the Federal Register on March 21, 1978, BATF is allowing an additional comment period on the regulations. Now those interested will have the additional time to respond and make their objections known and I would encourage as many individual citizens as possible to do so. Comments will now be received up until and including June 30, 1978. Written data, comments, or suggestions should be submitted to the Director, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms, 1200 Pennsylvania Avenue NW., Washington, D.C. 20226, with attention to the Regulations and Procedure Division.

In another direction I am also gravely concerned over the Occupational Safety and Health Administration's move to cripple sport hunting in the United States.

In a recent Louisiana case OSHA officials ruled that hunters represent a real hazard to timberworkers when they are not controlled.

The implications of control in the position now being taken by OSHA are so far reaching that they stagger the imagination.

If allowed to stand, the agency's ruling could ultimately cause individuals and privately owned corporations everywhere to reconsider allowing sportsmen access to those millions of acres of game-rich timberland that they privately own or control.

In addition, free access to certain public lands such as national forests and refuges, where hunters and workers have traditionally shared the woods, could also be severely curtailed or jeopardized.

I have recently introduced legislation to stop this intrusion by OSHA by amending the occupational safety and health law to state that "Nothing in this Act shall be construed to authorize any regulations designed to restrict hunting, sport fishing, or shooting sports * * *"

Federal regulatory burglars seem to be endlessly finding new ways to rip off the basic rights of American citizens. It may be a well-intended Robin Hood act, but the loss of freedom in the name of do-good programs is still something to be seriously reckoned with. We must respond forcefully and aggressively to these challenges to our freedoms or face losing them.●

WASHINGTON INTERNATIONAL BOULEVARD

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, Washington has been an international boulevard in the last few weeks as heads of state from all continents of the globe have passed through this city to meet with our beloved President.

One visitor, the President of Zambia, His Excellency Kenneth D. Kaunda, has received considerable press attention. One of the more interesting commentaries on his visit was that by the distinguished liberal columnist, John P. Roche. His column, appearing in the Washington Star of May 26, should have the Members' attention:

THE DOUBLE LIFE KAUNDA MUST LEAD

(By John P. Roche)

President Kenneth D. Kaunda of Zambia, surely one of the most decent and talented African statesmen, has been forced by circumstances to live a double life.

When, for example, the United Nations took out after Ian Smith's Rhodesia and imposed economic sanctions on the white regime, Zambia was the first to break the rule. Economic necessity dictated it: Before the completion of the Tanza Road to the east coast, Zambia's only outlet for its copper was the railroad through Rhodesia. Basically a moderate, Kaunda has been cast in the role of a militant toward the internal settlement in Rhodesia and has as unwelcome guests a substantial Rhodesian black guerrilla presence.

Recently, Kaunda was here giving the Carter administration advice on its African policy, urging it to push support for black majority rule in Rhodesia and South Africa. It might be added that Kaunda runs a pretty tight ship in Zambia: He's probably in about the same league as the Philippines' Marcos when it comes to democratic rights, that is, well below the standard in Botswana or Guyana, but light years above Amin's Uganda or Kim's North Korea.

The invasion of Zaire's Shaba province from Angolo put Kaunda in a bind. Nothing is more precise to the decolonized African states than the arbitrary borders established by the imperialists. When the French, British, Portuguese, or Belgians worked out a border, they had no compunction about dividing tribes in half; and German Southwest Africa, now Namibia, was provided with an extension almost to the center of Africa—the Caprivi Strip—for reasons I have long since forgotten. At any rate, as the Somali-Ethiopian blow-up indicated, territorial integrity, however loony in rational terms, is a top priority.

Kaunda thus took a very muted position on the use of French and Belgian paratroops, with U.S. logistical back-up, to aid President Mobutu. In essence, he called on all the warring factions to get together in brotherly reconciliation. The Western rescue mission in Shaba seems to have been consigned to the same operational category by Kaunda as the Cubans in Ethiopia and Angola.

However, at one point Kaunda really went off the tracks. While calling on the U.S. to support black majority rule in Africa, he also criticized us for not recognizing President Agostinho Neto's regime in Angola. This is curious because the Neto regime is run by assimilados, "brown Portuguese" as they are called, and its opposition is solidly black. One of the best kept secrets of Portuguese decolonization was that power in both Angola and Mozambique was not turned over to black liberation movements but to detribalized mestizos, of mixed ancestry.

Under Portuguese rule the assimilados were a sub-elite. Some of them, including Neto, went to the university in Portugal, and special jobs were reserved for them in the administration. (In similar fashion, the Anglo-Indians ran the subcontinent's railway system under British rule.) The blacks in the bush were exploited jointly by the Portuguese and the assimilados, and—as might be expected—the growth of sophisticated political concepts also occurred in the latter group. Thus the irony: Black liberation was to be spearheaded by imitation Portuguese.

It took the Cubans to "stabilize" Neto's regime against its black opponents, and it is estimated that the writ of the black liberation movement runs virtually to the city limits of Luanda. In short, Neto's is not a government based on black majority rule, but on minority mestizo power backed by Soviet sepoys.

Indeed, Neto originally obtained power through a sweetheart deal. The last Portuguese high commissioner, Admiral Rosa Couthino, was pro-communist and as he departed handed Neto and Co., the "Marxist-Leninists," the keys to the kingdom.

The legitimacy of the Angolan government Kenneth Kaunda wants us to recognize therefore rests on first, a Portuguese benefaction, and, second, Cuban soldiers and Soviet supplies! There is a third player with a very low silhouette; Gulf Oil, which wants to protect its Cabinda investments and provides Neto with the bulk of his foreign exchange.

As a vigorous supporter of black majority rule in Angola, I suggest the United States not only refuse to recognize the assimilado usurpers, but provide aid and comfort to the black liberation movements. And Kaunda should do likewise. The Soviets need a Vietnam experience to temper their interventionist enthusiasm.●

"THE ROAD TO PROSPERITY—PART IV—DYNAMIC ANALYSIS OF THE INVESTMENT INCENTIVE ACT"

OF WISCONSIN

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. STEIGER. Mr. Speaker, my previous installment on the Investment Incentive Act included the static analysis which had been done by the Joint Tax Committee. In addition to static analysis, there is also dynamic, or economic, analysis which attempts to measure the economic, and not just the revenue, impact of changes in our tax laws.

It is relatively easy to measure the amount of taxes being paid currently, and the amount of taxes which would be paid if tax rates were raised or lowered. This arithmetic analysis is of limited value. It does not measure the economic impact.

Econometric models have been designed to provide estimates on economic activity for a variety of purposes. Assumptions have to be made and data constructed to produce results. Thus, two key questions are whether the assumptions accurately reflect the real world and whether the data is valid. Both questions are debatable issues, but they can be settled through logical discourse.

The models are more complicated than the simple arithmetic analysis which is usually done on tax bills. People react to changes in taxes, and their reactions—feedback—affect economic activity. Changes in economic activity mean changes in tax revenues. Thus, arithmetic analysis cannot be relied on for an accurate statement of what will happen to tax revenues when tax rates or tax policy is altered.

For instance, the 1969 Tax Reform Act was accompanied by revenue estimates which showed a net gain in tax revenue from the increase in the capital gains tax. The actual result has been the opposite, revenues have declined.

We have to take into account the feedback affects of our policy decisions. We have to know the economic implications of what we are doing. We are fortunate in having four analyses of the Investment Incentive Act. Today, I am including in the RECORD an analysis by Merrill Lynch Economics. Tomorrow, I will include the fourth analysis for the Members' review:

AN ANALYSIS BY MERRILL LYNCH ECONOMICS

I. SUMMARY OF RESULTS

A roll-back in the maximum capital gains tax rates from current levels to 25 percent for both individuals and corporations, effective in the third quarter of 1978, would have the following beneficial affects on the economic outlook through 1980:

Improves the average rate of growth of real GNP to 3.5 percent as compared with the 3.3 percent rate forecast under the current tax law,

Reduces the unemployment rate from 5.7 percent to 5.5 percent through the creation of 205,000 additional jobs by 1980,

Reduces the Federal budget deficit by $2.3 billion in 1980,

Instills an additional $3.2 billion in real fixed business investment over the period.

These economic impacts have been simulated with the Merrill Lynch Economics Macro Econometric Model which traces the primary causal flows from tax rate roll-back to economic benefits as follows:

A reduced capital gains tax will tend to increase current market prices for capital assets.

In particular, the prices of financial assets—especially equity—will tend to increase.

Increased equity and bond values reduces the cost of capital to the corporation.

This reduction in capital costs stimulates investment in plant and equipment.

The increased plant and equipment spending stimulates the economy leading to enhanced real GNP growth, more jobs, higher tax revenues via ordinary income and profits taxes, and greater productivity.

The decline in the Federal deficit results from increased tax revenues and reduced transfer payments—both effects arising from the stimulated economy.

The decline in the capital gains tax rate should be essentially offset, in revenue terms, by the expected increased capital gains realizations accompanying a stronger equities market.

Any impact analysis of this sort ultimately depends on assumptions made about factors which are either unquantifiable or, at best, difficult to assess. Throughout the analysis, we have attempted to gauge these factors so as to err on the side of understating the beneficial results:

We have minimized the potential stock market strength to that which is quantifiable from the tax rate decline alone. Accordingly, stock prices rise only 4 to 6 percent above the level calculated without a capital gains tax reduction. An even stronger stock market—with higher economic benefits than estimated here—could ensue if a very large volume of capital gains realizations unfolds resulting in a heightened "bull market" psychology as locked-in positions are liquidated.

We have minimized the potential decline in long-term corporate bond rates that could result from the lower capital gains taxes and the improvement in balance sheets as more equity is issued. Here the average new issue bond rate declines by no more than 10 basis points (0.1 percent).

We have ignored the beneficial effects that rising values of other capital assets (aside from stocks and bonds) could bring to the economy.

II. STOCK MARKET ANALYSTS AND DETAILED ECONOMIC IMPACTS

1. Exhibits I and II: Standard & Poors 500—Stock Price Index and The Corporate Cost of Equity Capital—Standard & Poors 500.

The dashed line from 1970 to 1978 in Exhibit I shows that the stock market (as measured by the S&P 500) would have been about 2 to 3½ percent higher if the maximum capital gains tax had not been increased beginning in 1970. The maximum rate for individuals (excluding minimum tax) was actually increased in steps from 25 to 29.5 percent in 1970, 32.5 in 1971 and to the full 35 percent in 1972. For corporations, the maximum rate increased to 28 percent in 1971 and to 30 percent thereafter. Increases in the minimum tax holding periods, and other provisions further heightened the capital gains tax burden. In terms of the cost of equity capital to the firm, the higher tax increased this cost by 10 to 20 basis points over the period. Comparisons of the cost of equity capital are presented in Exhibit II.

As can be seen in Exhibit I, in the forecast period (third quarter 1978 to end of 1980) the reduction in capital gains would increase stock prices by 4 to 6 percent over the Basic Forecast (no change in tax rates). This translates into a 25 to 30 basis point drop in the cost of equity capital to the firm, as shown in Exhibit II.

2. Exhibit III: Comparison of Forecasts for Key Economic Indicators.

Exhibit III presents a comparison, for several key economic indicators, of the Merrill Lynch Economics May Basic Forecast through 1980 versus the Lower Capital Gains Taxes simulation. The tax rate decrease is assumed to be effective as of the third quarter of 1979.

AIRPORT FOR AVALON

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, the Department of Transportation has recently agreed to provide $100,886 planning grant to assist in the development of essential studies leading to the establishment of a public airport on Catalina Island.

This spectacular island in the Pacific, less than 30 miles from Los Angeles, has become one of the most attractive and popular resort areas in the United States. It is dependent, to a considerable extent, on general aviation to bring visitors from the mainland, because the existing airport and seaplane facilities are inadequate for larger commercial airliners.

The new facility would be located conveniently near the city of Avalon, and its development for commercial aviation as well as for expanded general aviation use would be a tremendous boost for the business community, which is uniquely dependent on the tourist trade for its survival.

The Department of Transportation grant, which goes to the city of Avalon for the airport master plan study, is a welcome first step in the development of this much-needed airport.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to include in the RECORD a copy of an article by Don Downie in the October 1977 issue of the AOPA Pilot, the publication of the Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association:

AIRPORT IN THE SKY

(By Don Downie)

For the past 18 years, probably the most popular private resort airport in the country has been at Santa Catalina Island, some 28 miles out in the Pacific Ocean near Los Angeles. This year-round resort will attract an average of 400 private planes on a clear weekend, plus a steady stream of pilots who drop in for lunch or an overnight during the week. In 1976, a total of 23,474 aircraft (that's 46,948 "operations" by FAA counting) landed at "The Airport In The Sky." At an average of three people per aircraft, that's over 70,000 visitors.

Why Santa Catalina? It's different, comfortable, a change-of-pace from the mainland; it has a wide variety of tourist attractions plus the adrenaline-activation of a short, over-water flight.

Where else can you get a buffalo burger at the airport or take home a 10-pound package of frozen buffalo meat for $25? Where else can you ride a glass-bottom boat, look at sea lions or seals in their natural habitat or spend part of an evening watching flying fish?

You can find just about everything offered at salt-water resorts around the world on this 21-mile-long island. The climate is nearly perfect, usually 10° cooler than the immediate mainland, while the water, warmed by the Japanese current, varies from 67° to 76°F.

Santa Catalina Island has been used by real-life pirates and smugglers since 50 years after Columbus discovered America. Chinese slave ships and prohibition-day bootleggers hid in the island's many coves. And, as in any such locale, there are tales of pirate loot and sunken treasure yet to be found.

The city of Avalon with some 1,700 full-time residents, plays host to thousands of mainlanders every weekend. Avalon harbor has mooring for 342 yachts and anchorage for several hundred more. The airport has 40 tiedowns and parking for an additional 125 visiting aircraft.

An early owner of the island was the family of southwest stagecoach baron General Phineas Banning. Along with other construction, he built a stagecoach road from Avalon, past the present site of the airport, up to the isthmus, now called Two Harbors. At the turn of the century, stagecoaches took a day and a half to cover the tortuous 23 land-miles between Avalon and the isthmus. Today, a fleet of mini-buses transport airport visitors to Avalon on what Catalina airport manager Gerry Vanderville calls "a very long 10-mile road." He should know since he frequently drives one of the mini-buses on weekends. Travel time is 30 minutes each way and the round-trip fare is $4.50. Airport records indicate that 14 percent of fly-in visitors go on to Avalon.

Two Harbors is a 13-mile drive from the airport or can be reached from Avalon by a daily excursion boat. Cab fare from the airport to the isthmus is $40 for up to eight people. This relatively isolated area has been the location for many "South Sea" motion pictures dating back to "Mutiny On The Bounty," the Erroll Flynn epics and, most recently, "MacArthur."

trip, coastal cruise where seals and sea lions can be watched, skyline bus tour (which you don't really need if you've flown in), Casino tour, flying fish boat trip (May thru September nights) and the Two Harbors boat trip all originate at Avalon. The town has 28 hotel-motel combinations, while Two Harbors has one. Reservations are recommended summer months and a well-staffed Chamber of Commerce (P.O. Box 217, Avalon, CA 90704) is more than prepared to answer all questions.

A syndicate, headed by William Wrigley, Jr. (of chewing gum fame) acquired a majority interest in the island in 1919. For 26 seasons beginning in 1921, his Chicago Cubs held spring training here. At the present time, 86% of the island is owned by the Santa Catalina Island Conservancy, dedicated to preserving open space, wild lands and nature preserves. The remaining 14% includes the City of Avalon and property at the isthmus.

For the history buffs, the first flight across the Catalina channel dates back to 1912 with pilot Glenn C. Martin at the controls of his "hydro-aeroplane." Distance was 33 miles and flight time 37 minutes. The first scheduled passenger service began in 1919 with Sidney Chaplin, brother of Charlie Chaplin, as operator. The short-lived line used a three-passenger Curtis "F" Seagull flying boat. Passenger transportation was even attempted by a Goodyear "Pony Blimp" about 1925 but proved too costly.

A series of amphibious aircraft have been used since 1920. The World War II Grumman Goose amphibs, grounded by the FAA a few months ago, are expected to be returned to service within the near future. A close-to-town STOL strip is presently under discussion.

Construction on "The Airport In The Sky" was begun shortly before WW II when two mountain peaks were leveled off for a 3,200-by 100-foot runway. "Level" is not exactly an accurate term since the first two-thirds of Runway 22 (used 99% of the time) has a 2% uphill slope. The high point of the strip, 1,602 feet, is 40 feet above "the numbers" on Runway 22. However, uphill takeoffs present few problems, since pilots merely "fly off the cliff" over a steep canyon after takeoff.

During WW II, the partially-completed runway was covered with railroad rails to make it both unusable and unnecessary to defend. The runway was completed shortly after WW II and a fine airline terminal of Spanish architecture, frequently seen on late-late movies, was built in 1946, when United Airlines began scheduled DC-3 service. General aviation has been permitted since 1959. Almost the entire island is privately owned, so no county, state or federal funds have gone into building or maintaining the airport and a $1.50 landing fee is charged for singles or twins.

The airport is open year-round, 8 a.m. to 7 p.m. in the summer and 8 to 5 in the winter. Unicom is available during all hours of operation and a VASI was recently installed that has made possible an 80 to 90% reduction in poor approaches, according to Vanderville.

A question-and-answer sheet has been developed for visiting pilots by Vanderville, who has run the airport since 1972. He advises that "the downhill slope of Runway 4 is not a straight line. This creates a situation in which an aircraft using Runway 4 cannot see an aircraft taking off or landing on Runway 22. Even with Unicom advisories, this is an uncontrolled airport and communications with all aircraft cannot be assured.

"Take-offs and landings are not allowed when the airport is closed because of both safety and airport security. Our resident and RON (remain over night) aircraft deserve some protection against theft and vandalism. Our sheriff is most observant of any aircraft operation after hours.

"We have landing lights but do not allow takeoffs or landings when the airpart is closed except to medical and law enforcement personnel during an emergency.

"In addition to an initial Unicom report, as recommended by the FAA, we request one additional call when downwind at midfield to help our full-time Unicom operator in the tower advise how many other aircraft have previously reported. . . . We can receive 33 other Unicom stations from our altitude and hear aircraft calling 41 ground stations. Because of our altitude and water reflection, we are able to transmit an excellent signal with a standard 10-watt radio.

"And, on a nice day, we will have 600 aircraft operations in an eight-hour period."

Airport Manager Vanderville reports that the field, its lunches, buses and small landing fee are beginning to show a slight profit after 31 years of red ink. These dollars go into the island's conservancy fund. Thus, in contrast to most airport development, "The Air port In The Sky" is contributing to a wilderness activity rather than being a problem to conservationists.

While no overnight camping facilities are available at the airport, backpackers have a selection of several approved, maintained campsites. Blackjack is just three miles distant while the popular Little Harbor is six miles distant and on the beach. Water, tables, restroom facilities and marked camping areas here are popular. The downhill hike to Little Harbor causes visitors little problem, but it's the hike back that can be tedious. Fly-in bicycles and motorcycles are not permitted because of winding, semi-paved roads and steep cliffs. Drivers of the few privately owned vehicles on the island are reluctant to provide a lift because of the insurance liability on privately-owned roads.

In the one large hangar on Catalina, you'll usually find the immaculate DC-3, N64784, owned by the Wrigley estate. Used sparingly during WW II by an Army General, this show-piece airplane has less than 3,000 hours total time. Vanderville, who "doubles in brass" as Captain on this venerable transport, believes that this is the lowest-time DC-3 (C-47) now in flying condition.

The only "hot line" to the Los Angeles FSS is located in the tower of Santa Catalina. Conspicuous by its absence is a fuel pit or gas truck and this is deliberate, according to the airport manager.

"We have two reasons for not supplying fuel. One would be the cost of barging it across and getting it up to the airport," he explained. "The main reason, however, is strictly safety. We fog in from twenty to forty days a year and had seventy-two days last year when the weather went below VFR minimums for part of the day. We feel that pilots planning to land here should have more than enough fuel to make the round trip, so that they're not 'hanging out to get wet' if our weather goes down."

All-in-all, Santa Catalina is a wonderful change-of-pace landing site whether you want a buffalo burger, a stroll in smog-free air, a back-packing picnic, a trip to Avalon in the mini-bus or merely sitting in the shade, watching other pilots solve the problems of putting wheels down on this unusual runway.●

THE HOUSE SPEAKS STRONGLY AGAINST PANAMA CANAL GIVEAWAY

HON. GEORGE HANSEN

OF IDAHO

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, the House has again voted strong opposition to the Panama Canal giveaway by passing my amendment today, 203 to 163 showing the issue to be very much alive. The hairbreadth Senate win on the Panama Canal Treaty in April took a lot of doing, including unprecedented wheeling and dealing. Many Americans are still wondering what caused their Senators to vote against the desires of the people.

President Carter would have everyone believe that he has won and the game is over, however that is not true. Round two of the battle is just beginning as the House of Representatives considers authorization and funding legislation. For months I have led the fight in Congress to insure that the people's voice is heard on this critical issue through the actions of the House.

Early last fall as the treaties were signed, I introduced House Concurrent Resolution No. 347 which states that U.S. property in the Canal Zone could not be conveyed to Panama except by an act involving both Houses of Congress. This resolution is a constitutional issue supported heavily by both parties with 240 cosponsors, a clear majority of the Members of the House.

Americans have continued to express their objections to the Panama treaties along with their desire for the House to act. The people obviously understand the Constitution and it is our duty as their elected Representatives to honor their wishes and protect their interests.

Despite the overwhelming support of House Concurrent Resolution No. 347, the influence of the Carter administration's efforts to restrict canal transfer consideration to the Senate has made House action difficult to obtain and predict. Therefore, I have begun a discharge petition (No. 6) to force an early vote in the House and now have 190 signatures on the way to the needed 218.

The end is in sight now and hopefully the last few signatures can be obtained soon. Many Members have already heeded the call from home and have agreed to sign the discharge petition.

In the meantime I have reinforced the goal of House Concurrent Resolution 347 by securing House passage of several amendments to recent legislation.

On the first concurrent resolution on the budget I proposed an amendment designed to stop any slush funding of the Panama treaties which passed the House by a vote of 231 to 170 and was finally accepted by both the House and the Senate in the conference report several weeks ago. This amendment declared an intent by Congress to eliminate the never-used $40,000,000 borrowing authority of the Canal Company and bring the Panama budget closely under the scrutiny of the Congress so that there is no authority for transfer of funds or property in Panama without a specific act of Congress.

Last week I was successful in attaching an amendment by a 2-to-1 margin to the fiscal year 1979 Military Appropriations Authorizations which stated that—

Notwithstanding any other provision of law, none of the funds authorized to be appropriated for the Department of Defense by this or any other Act shall be used directly or indirectly for the purpose of effecting any force reduction or base realignment in the Panama Canal Zone in support of implementation of the Panama Canal Treaties approved by the United States Senate in 1978 without a specific Act of Congress.

With the adventures of Castro's Cuba in extorting revolution and terrorism across the world, this is hardly the time to take lightly any efforts to withdraw U.S. presence from the Caribbean and particularly the Canal Zone.

And today my amendment to H.R. 12598, the Foreign Relations Authorizations for fiscal year 1979, which passed by 203 to 163, stipulated that—

None of the funds herein authorized to be appropriated shall be used to effect implementation of the Panama Canal Treaties of 1978 without a specific Act of Congress authorizing such implementation.

The House of Representatives is the voice of the people in Government and the success of my amendments reflect a continued feeling of the people of the United States as demonstrated by their Congressman against giving away the Panama Canal, which is one of the Nation's greatest commercial and military assets.

Members of Congress are sending messages to the White House loud and clear and with increasing frequency that continued administration efforts to avoid proper constitutional processes by seeking back-door funding and improper implementation of the Panama treaties without necessary congressional authorization is headed for big trouble.

It is important for the President and everyone concerned to understand that the legislative process regarding the Panama Canal treaties is not complete and that there should be no premature exchange of agreements such as is planned between President Carter and Torrijos for mid-June if we are to avoid creating a dangerous situation caused by false hopes and misunderstandings.

The initiative taken by the House to prevent the Canal Zone transfer has been spearheaded by my resolution and the Hansen amendments. The main thrust will come on forthcoming legislation for transfer of property, appropriations of requested funds, and treaty implementation requirements.

In the meantime our efforts are to prevent any premature exchange of documents by the President with Panama in violation of the Brooke amendment to the treaties which stipulates that no official exchange can be made before next March 31 or until Congress acts.●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of the Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—of the time, place, and purpose of all meetings when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in meetings as they occur.

As an interim procedure until the computerization of this information becomes operational the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committees scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Thursday, June 1, 1978, may be found in Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Thursday, June 1, 1978

The House met at 10 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Edward G. Latch, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Be strong in the Lord and in the power of His might.—Ephesians 6: 10.

Eternal God, our Father, who art the source of our being and the goal of our moral efforts, by whom we are made strong and with whom we find our way through life, at the beginning of another day we pause before Thee seeking guidance and wisdom from Thee. Make straight our way and give us strength to walk on it without stumbling.

Forgive our rebellion against all that which is unpleasant—against discipline, disappointment, and disillusionment. Teach us to learn the lessons in life by which our spirits can grow and Thyself be made known. Lead us, we pray Thee, to a deeper understanding of Thy will for us and our world. May we walk with Thee as we seek to build on Earth the kingdom of truth and love and justice. Be with us, Lord, and may we be with Thee that our building shall not be in vain and our lives shall be strong in Thee. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Without objection, the Journal stands approved.

There was no objection.

JAMES H. BLALOCK

(Mr. HUBBARD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, it is with sadness that I speak today in the House of Representatives regarding the late James H. Blalock, of Murray, Ky.

Jimmy Blalock, a licensed funeral director and embalmer, was born on June 26, 1918, in Calloway County, Ky. He was the son of Mrs. Essie Bell Blalock, who survives, and the late Dr. Elijah R. Blalock, who died in 1933.

This veteran of World War II was a man of many interests and responsibilities. His life was full. He served Calloway County 18 years as circuit court clerk beginning in 1958 and extending through 1975. He was the cofounder of the Blalock-Coleman funeral home in Murray.

Jimmy Blalock was an active churchman most of his life. His duties at Memorial Baptist Church in Murray included Sunday school teacher, church treasurer, and deacon.

Additionally, he was named treasurer of the Murray-Calloway County Library Board in 1951, where he served for 12 years. He was also chairman of the United Fund for Calloway County in 1960; a member of the Veterans of Foreign Wars; an American Legionnaire; a member of the Lions Club; named a Kentucky Colonel in 1975; and commissioned an honorary clerk of the Kentucky Court of Appeals in 1974. He was an alumnus of Murray State University.

Surviving are his wife of 37 years, Margaret Purdom Blalock; his mother, Mrs. Essie Blalock of Murray; two daughters, Mrs. Jay (Betsy) Bucy and Mrs. Michael (Katie) Jull, both of Louisville; one brother, Pat Blalock of University City, Mo.; and two grandchildren, Stacey and Caroline Bucy, both of Louisville.

I extend to the Blalock family my sincere sympathy upon the passing of this truly outstanding Kentuckian whose life, a positive influence in the past, will continue as a noble example into the future.

TUITION TAX CREDIT ACT OF 1978

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 1178 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 1178

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 12050) to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide a Federal income tax credit for tuition. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means, the bill shall be considered as having been read for amendment. No amendment to the bill shall be in order except the following amendments, which shall not be subject to amendment but which may be debated by the offering of pro forma amendments and which shall if offered be considered in the following order: (1) an amendment printed in the Congressional Record of April 26, 1978 by Representative Vanik beginning on page E2171, to provide a tax credit for tuition at elementary and secondary schools; (2) an amendment printed in the Congressional Record of April 26, 1978 by Representative Vanik beginning on page E2172, to increase the percentage of tuition allowable as a credit; (3) amendments recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means; and (4) an amendment printed in the Congressional Record of April 18, 1978 by Representative Mikva, and all points of order against the amendments described in (1) and (4) above for failure to comply with clause 7, rule XVI are hereby waived. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York (Mr. DELANEY) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. LOTT), pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, on May 10, 1978, the Committee on Rules, by a nonrecord vote, granted a modified rule providing for consideration of H.R. 12050, the Tuition Tax Credit Act of 1978. This rule, House Resolution 1178, provides for 2 hours of general debate and provides for the allowance of three amendments which would not be subject to amendment.

As reported from the Ways and Means Committee, H.R. 12050 provides a Federal income tax credit for tuition paid by a taxpayer for himself, his spouse or any of his dependents for post-secondary education, with the credit set at 25 percent of tuition paid by a taxpayer. The maximum credit is $100 in 1978, $150 in 1979, and $250 in 1980 for each eligible student.

Mr. Speaker, as I have previously stated, there are three amendments specificially spelled out in the rule and these amendments would not be subject to amendment. First, there is an amendment by Congressman VANIK of Ohio which would apply the tax credit to tuition paid to elementary and secondary schools. Second, a further amendment by Congressman VANIK would increase the credit from 25 to 50 percent of tuition expenses. And third, an amendment in the nature of a substitute by Congressman MIKVA of Illinois that would provide for the deferral of income taxes for certain tuition expenses rather than a tuition tax credit.

The tuition tax credit legislation is designed to provide a simple and effective method to help middle-income citizens faced with heavy tuition costs at primary, secondary, and post-secondary educational levels. The bill gives a break to low- and middle-income parents in private schools who bear both the heavy costs of private school tuition and taxes for public schools.

In addition to paying their full share of the public school expense budget, these families have spared the general public the expense of educating their children; a savings of $14 billion a year. Now, due to higher tuition costs, a 130-percent increase in taxes over the past decade, inflation and the resulting reduction in disposable income, these taxpayers have asked us to provide a modicum of relief, in reality just a minimal dose of financial encouragement, so they may continue.

The sacrifices have been substantial. At the elementary and secondary school levels, the typical family patronizing nonpublic schools has an income of between $10,000 and $18,000 a year. In many nonpublic schools, despite rigorous efforts to hold down costs, tuition expenses now exceed that at many public colleges.

We should also keep in mind that parents and students paying those tuition expenses at public colleges and universities will also be able to take advantage of the credits. In fact, the majority of the benefits will continue to go toward tuition expenses at public institutions, and only about 30 percent of the credits will go to those sending their children to nonpublic elementary and secondary schools.

That brings us to a question central to this debate: Why a tax credit? In a word, the answer is simplicity. That underscores the mechanics of the tax credit system. A set credit applied against an eligible individual's tax liability. But there is another, and perhaps more important justification for using the credit system, and that is fairness.

If one examines the tax code you will find that there are currently 13 tax credits available to individuals and businesses. You will also find there is a common philosophical rationale behind a clear majority of these credits: The desire of Congress to grant some small degree of relief to groups within our society who have come to share a disproportionate amount of the fiscal burden.

Among the most pertinent examples are the credit for the elderly, the earned income credit, the child and dependent care credit, and the provisions for the aged and blind within the general tax credit.

It should be clear that the spirit behind the passage of these tax credits was essentially one of fairness. Congress recognized when certain members of our society required extra help and responded. The intent of Congress in these instances is unquestionable and most admirable.

I sincerely hope that that same spirit of fairness and perception of need is manifest in this Chamber today. A need exists, one made vividly clear by the millions of American families who have written us in support of this legislation. The method of addressing that need is readily at hand: The tax credit; one of Congress traditional tools for meeting such a need. The mandate is obvious. The time to act is now.

As we are well aware, the Senate has passed some form of tuition tax credit six times during the past decade.

Regarding public education, the record speaks for itself. The intent of Congress has been to make the American public school system the best in the world—which I believe it is. But with regard to nonpublic schools, there Congress actions have fallen short of its intent. While dedicated to the principle of a pluralistic system of education, with public and private schools providing a wide range of opportunity and healthy competition, Congress has failed to provide any encouragement to those making often undue sacrifices to maintain that very system which it philosophically supports.

This legislation offers us a chance to redress that injustice. The intent of this legislation is to avert a monopoly on education in this country by encouraging in a small way those who now support the non-public-school system to keep on doing just that, while directing the vast majority of relief to those who are hard pressed by increasing college tuitions. This bill is in no way antipublic school, and to accuse Congress of having that intent is to ignore the overwhelmingly pro-public-school record it has established not only during my years in the House, but for years before that as well.

I can say quite honestly that as I have followed this issue, over the past three and one-half decades, I have watched the need for this legislation snowball, and have believed that this day and this vote were inevitable. If we should fail to pass this measure, including the amendment to restore the credit at the elementary and secondary levels, the political problems it presents may subside for a short time, but the real problem, the need for this legislation, will not. It will return again and again, more and more desperate as that need continues to grow. In the meantime, who can say how much not just our nonpublic schools, but our entire school system, will backslide into deterioration, and how much our society will lose in the bargain.

The time for Congress to act is upon us. I do not believe we can afford to miss this opportunity.

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELANEY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BIAGGI. I thank the gentleman from New York (Mr. DELANEY) for yielding, and congratulate him for his initiative on this measure and also recognize his contribution to the Congress and his continued efforts in this area for a number of decades.

Mr. Speaker, it seems only fitting and proper that at the end of the gentleman's congressional career—as the Members know, the gentleman is not seeking reelection, the time is appropriate. The public pressures have mounted. The need is critical. The public has clearly manifested its interest in this matter.

I certainly support the rule. It has taken far too long for this issue to reach the House floor. The gentleman from New York has dedicated much time and energy so we can reach this point today.

The sentiments and opinions on this bill have come from many sides. Some have been accurate, others more demagogic. The argument which best influences me is the one that says approval of this legislation, with the elementary and secondary students included, represents justice. That is on what I am basing my vote. We are correcting an inequity borne too long by the parents of children attending nonpublic schools.

In the name of equity and justice, some relief should be given to the nonpublic-school areas; and it should be noted for history and for all of the people of our Nation that the gentleman in the well has been deeply concerned, deeply involved, and has been constant in his effort to bring some relief to the non-public-school area.

Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from New York (Mr. DELANEY). I have joined him as a cosponsor of his legislation which embodies much of what we are considering today. It would certainly be a fitting tribute to the gentleman if we were to adopt this legislation today.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his observations.

Mr. WYDLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELANEY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WYDLER. Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to congratulate the gentleman from New York (Mr. DELANEY) on the leadership that he is taking in this particular matter.

Although I have, obviously, been lobbied very heavily on both sides of this issue by educators, and as important as the education issues might be, they are secondary in our consideration of this legislation. The primary principle involved here is tax relief for the hard-pressed middle-income people of our country; and I think they are entitled to some tax relief. I think the fact that it is connected with the educational field only makes that tax relief more justified because encouraging good education in our country is something that should be supported by all the Members of the House and the Senate.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the gentleman. I am going to support the bill. I am going to support the Vanik amendment, and I hope that we will get an overwhelming response from this body and from the other body so that the President might reconsider his position in this matter, which up to this time is not only inconsistent but, I feel, very shortsighted.

Mr. Speaker, I say to the gentleman from New York (Mr. DELANEY) that he will be sorely missed in this House in the coming Congress. The leadership that he is displaying on this matter today is one of the best indications of why that leadership has been so important to us in the House of Representatives.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his observations.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELANEY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the distinguished gentleman in the well for his leadership on this issue, which has gone on over the years in a very constant and steady manner.

I am glad that we are at the point where the House of Representatives is now ready to deal with this very, very important legislation.

I want to point out that the Committee on Ways and Means held hearings for over a week and heard extensive testimony on both sides of this issue and that during the markup in the Committee on Ways and Means there were three principal issues that were raised, three principal amendments that were offered.

One amendment struck out the secondary and elementary schools which my first amendment would restore.

The second amendment which was adopted in the Committee on Ways and Means reduced the ceiling on the tuition credit from 50 percent of tuition to 25 percent, an amendment to restore the credit to 50 percent of tuition is the second amendment which is made in order under the rule.

The third issue which was debated and closely voted on in the Committee on Ways and Means was the Mikva amendment, which is not a tuition credit idea at all. It is a tax-deferral plan which the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA) will discuss during the course of colloquy and debate on this issue, so that, under the rule, we are giving the House an opportunity to express itself on the three main issues of discussion which came up in the Committee on Ways and Means.

Although the rule makes in order amendments by the Committee on Ways and Means, there are no such amendments planned so that when we move into the consideration of this bill, these three amendments will be debated and voted upon, giving the House a full opportunity to express itself on those issues which were the most seriously discussed and which were closely voted upon in the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the Committee on Rules and the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rules for providing a rule which gives us this opportunity to express ourselves on those principal issues of controversy in the Committee on Ways and Means.

I urge my colleagues to adopt the rule. It is a fair rule.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman in the well for his leadership on this entire issue.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his observations.

Mr. COTTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELANEY. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. COTTER. Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to commend and compliment the gentleman in the well for his persistence in bringing this legislation to the floor. Without his efforts, we would not be considering this important legislation today.

Mr. Speaker, I want to urge my colleagues to vote in favor of an amended tuition tax credit bill which would extend coverage to private elementary and secondary schools, and which would increase from 25 to 50 percent the amount of college tuition eligible for the credit.

I have received an enormous amount of constituent mail in favor of this legislation from parents who believe they are shouldering the burden of escalating expenses at both public and private schools through property taxes and tuition fees.

They feel, as do I, that we should be more concerned with the evident loss of private institutions than with an inflated fear over the effect of this legislation on public institutions. Without this greatly needed tax credit, private schools will have increasing difficulty in attracting students and in continuing to exist for families who want to exercise their right to make educational choices.

Disappointed with the bill that came out of the Ways and Means Committee last April—minus a provision for elementary and secondary schools—I wrote an article outlining my views which was printed in the New York Times, Connecticut section, on May 7, 1978. I would like to share those thoughts with my colleagues.

[From the New York Times, May 7, 1978]

WASHINGTON'S TUITION-AID BILL MISSES THE MARK

(By William R. Cotter)

Stripped of its provision to aid elementary and secondary private school students, the controversial tuition-tax credit bill was approved by the House Ways and Means Committee on April 12. It will be scheduled for House action shortly.

As it now reads, the bill would allow parents of college students to reduce their Federal income taxes by 25 percent of the tuition costs for each child, up to a maximum of $250 a student. This tax break would be phased in over the next three years and then expire in 1981.

Similar bills have been proposed in the last decade. They started becoming popular in the late 1960's, when the annual giant steps in tuition costs contributed to the many other sources of student unrest.

Many of those bills passed the Senate, but they were blocked repeatedly from reaching the House floor by the Ways and Means Committee. Thus the April 12 approval marked a dramatic reversal.

Although progress has been finally made on this issue, I am disappointed in the committee's decision to withdraw the provision for elementary and secondary education. The hue and cry over the demise of public schools, favoritism for parochial schools, constitutionality, increased racial segregation, and of course the bill's cost, are largely based on specious arguments.

Albert Shanker, head of the teachers union, predicts this legislation will precipitate "a huge exodus from the public schools." For starters, I have more faith in the quality of the Connecticut school system than those who would share Mr. Shanker's panic. Beyond that, I do not see the logic behind his excessive fears.

The tax credit for tuition costs that was removed from the House bill would have been $100 at a maximum ($250 applies to college students). The cheapest independent primary and secondary schools are the parochial ones. These are also the schools where the credit would have the largest impact because it constitutes a greater share of total cost.

Catholic high schools in the Hartford diocese cost about $800 this year for tuitions and books. Next year the price tag will be about $900. Thus a $100 credit would amount to 11 percent of total cost, and that figure decreases as tuition fees increase. For example, at the Loomis-Chaffee School in Windsor, where tuition is $3,375, the tax credit would amount to a mere 3 percent of the fee.

I find it hard to be persuaded by the argument that a tax credit amounting to 11 percent, at most, of secondary school fees would generate "a huge exodus" out of the public schools.

What it will do, however, is to enable low-income and middle-income parents to have the increased economic freedom needed to choose what school their child attends. For many young families that is a borderline decision.

Moreover, by encouraging parents to enroll their children in nonpublic schools we can preserve the treasured American ideal of choice at a time when inflation is slowly eroding those opportunities. Today 90 percent of all students attend public schools, giving the government a de facto monopoly in the business of educating our young.

Although I have been heavily lobbied by public-school administrators, my constituent mail has been overwhelmingly in favor of the tuition tax credit. In fact, I have received more letters on this issue than on any other in recent years.

My guess is that much of it comes from middle-income parents who feel they are carrying tax burdens for both the rich and the poor. These families earn between $12,000 and $20,000. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, about 51 percent of students attending nonpublic schools come from families earning less than $15,000, and 71 percent are from families earning below $25,000. So much for critics who claim the bill favors the wealthy.

Opponents of the tuition tax credit bill forget that parents who send their children to independent schools pay twice: first in state and local property taxes which finance public schools, and then in tuition payments at a private school. You might call it the reverse of double-dipping.

Yet these families are relieving the public schools of the cost of educating their children. If fewer of them are able to afford inflationary prices on both fronts—taxes and tuition—the doors will close on independent schools, triggering a tax increase to support a larger public-school enrollment.

For many critics of tuition tax credit, constitutionality is the crucial argument. They foresee an entanglement of church and state. This concern is understandable, but it is the Congress' responsibility to enact legislation it believes to be constitutional. Once a tax credit bill is passed, the Supreme Court will have the right to review it. In fact, the House bill provides for expeditious legal review before the Supreme Court, should any question arise as to its constitutionality.

Arguments that this legislation will foster segregation are also inflated. The House bill stipulates that eligible schools must be accredited by state law meet state attendance requirements and be tax-exempt. To qualify for tax-exempt status, an institution must be nonprofit and must not discriminate on the basis of race.

It is interesting to note that in Hartford, minority enrollment in Catholic schools is remarkably high. For example, at St. Joseph's Cathedral School, a downtown elementary school, 253 of the 372 students are black and 190 are non-Catholic. So much for discrimination.

Almost everyone agrees that some form of increased financial assistance for education is timely. Both the Senate and the House are considering tuition tax credit bills. The Administration, however, is strongly opposed to this legislation and the President has said he will veto a tuition tax credit bill.

In its place, President Carter has proposed a program of extended grants and loans to college students only, which would be administered by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. This program would cost an estimated $1.3 billion in additional grants but would not provide assistance for primary and secondary students.

By contrast, the tuition tax credit bill which I supported also had almost the same price tag but would cover all levels of education. And it would provide a timely tax break, readily available to all parents and students burdened with the high cost of learning.

Mr. RONCALIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELANEY. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. RONCALIO. Mr. Speaker, I thank the distinguished gentleman for yielding.

I have rarely heard such a capable argument asserted at the time of the presention of a resolution on a rule.

I want to commend the gentleman for his advocating the adoption of the Vanik amendment. If this measure gets my support and I think it will, it will represent a departure on my part from my long held position on the classic question of the "wall of separation" of church and State or—actually—how tax credits affect the "wall."

Mr. DELANEY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BURKE of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELANEY. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. BURKE of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment the gentleman from New York on his long service, not only in the House, but in bringing this bill to the House floor. I think there are two things that are important that we all should recognize. Tax relief is one, and good education is the other.

I think it is important to remember that, whether or not this bill is passed—and I am supporting it and hope it does—that there is still the fact that the taxpayers are going to continue to support the public educational system. So, Mr. Speaker, I think it is just about time for those who have continually supported the public education system get some tax relief if they desire and to send their children to other schools if they wish.

I do not think there is any reason that we should force people to go to public schools if they wish to send their children to other schools. We want to give them relief from the terrible burden they have now insofar as costs and taxes are concerned. I think consideration should be given them. What we want is good education for all of our schools.

Mr. Speaker, I am very honored to be able to support this legislation on the floor of the House, and I do intend to support it following my vote on the rule. And to the gentleman in the well, my colleague Mr. DELANEY, chairman of the Rules Committee, I say thank you for a job well done.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman. May I make this observation: This saves the taxpayers in excess of $13 billion per year. In addition to the ordinary contributions that the parents make, they contribute out of their own tax paid dollar some $13 billion to maintain the pluralistic system of education. It is not right for this country to have a monolithic system of education. We have always had a pluralistic system, and I think it should be encouraged.

We should pass this resolution and pass the amendment to be offered.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot pass up the opportunity to join in expressing my appreciation for the outstanding job that the chairman of the Rules Committee, the gentleman from New York (Mr. DELANEY) has done, not only on this issue but on many other issues. Especially, I want to note the fine job he did this morning in explaining the rule and the issue involved in this particular piece of legislation. I think he is certainly to be commended for his efforts with regard to the Tuition Tax Credit Act of 1978.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution provides for 2 hours of debate time in which to consider H.R. 12050, the Tuition Tax Credit Act of 1978. No amendments to the bill are in order except the following: One, an amendment by Mr. VANIK to provide a tax credit for tuition at elementary and secondary schools, two, an amendment by Representative VANIK to increase the percentage of tuition allowable as credit, three, amendments recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means, and four, an amendment by Mr. KETCHUM and Mr. MIKVA to provide for deferral of Federal income taxes rather than a tax credit. Clause 7 of rule XVI (the germaneness rule), which would lie against the amendment to add elementary and secondary schools and the income tax deferral amendment, is waived. There is a motion to recommit with or without instructions.

The purpose of this legislation is to allow for a Federal income tax credit for tuition paid by a taxpayer for himself, his spouse, or any dependent for postsecondary education. The credit is limited to 25 percent of tuition paid with a maximum of $100 in 1978, $150 in 1979, and $250 in 1980 for each eligible student. Those students who qualify are students enrolled in undergraduate colleges or postsecondary vocational schools, and part-time students under certain conditions. The legislation is to be effective from August 1, 1978, to December 31, 1980.

It is estimated that enactment of this bill will result in reductions in revenues totalling $16 million in fiscal year 1978, $417 million in fiscal year 1979, $780 million in fiscal year 1980, and $896 million in fiscal year 1981.

Mr. Speaker, this rule and the amendments it makes in order enjoyed bipartisan support during consideration by the Rules Committee. Although it is not a completely open rule as I would prefer, it is a rule which permits most of the major issues surrounding this controversial measure to be addressed.

Therefore, I support this rule so that we finally will be able to consider a measure that will benefit directly those American taxpayers who face the ever-increasing costs of higher education for themselves and their families, a measure which I fully endorse.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for yielding.

I support the gentleman's statements.

I am in support of tuition tax credits, across the board—college, elementary, secondary, trade schools. This is a sad moment for big Government liberals. The crack in the door is opening. Their outmoded concept of tax and tax, spend and spend, elect and elect has held sway for four decades. To this, modern liberals have added the words control and control.

This is the central issue. Will the taxpayer, the productive American, have some say over the expenditure of his own money? The liberal believes the Government owns your money and they want to collect it and spend it in ways they feel is in your interest. I think the time has come for the taxpayer to determine his own interest. Tax credits will start that trend.

My remarks on this subject can be found in the Wednesday, May 31 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on pages 15741, 15791, and 15799. In particular, I call your attention to my remarks on page 15741 which address the vexing problem of constitutionality, a scare tactic which has clouded this issue for a decade.

Mr. Speaker, this should be a great day. I realize the Democratic leadership has been burning the midnight oil and twisting arms to defeat the amendment which will allow credits for elementary and secondary schools. I strongly support that amendment and hope that the Members will show the good judgment to vote their own convictions and those of their constituents rather than succumb to the power tactics of the House leadership, the National Education Association, Federation of Teachers and the Big Government lobbies which oppose our efforts.

The liberal is committed to the transfer theory for social goals. They take the money of the productive person through taxation and transfer it to those who are not productive or to bureaucratic programs which can implement the social schemes of the Government bureaucrats. The tax credit theory obviously strikes terror in their hearts because in essence it allows the person who earns the money to have more say over how his own, I stress his own, money is spent. A revolutionary idea to the liberal but basic bedrock philosophy to those of us who oppose big Government expansion of authority over our lives and an ever-increasing confiscation of our earnings.

I oppose this closed, rigged rule because I think that there should be the opportunity to offer amendments which would increase and expand the credits. At least we can see a victory in getting this far, in getting the liberal leadership of the Democratic majority to bow to the tide of public opinion on this important subject.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOTT. I yield to the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS).

Mr. DELLUMS. I thank my colleague for yielding.

Given the reform spirit that has prevailed in the House for a number of years with respect to the rules, can my colleagues tell me the arguments to support a rule that is not simply an open rule allowing anyone to offer an amendment at any point?

Mr. LOTT. I covered some of those arguments in my statement. I certainly would feel more comfortable with a completely open rule. I think that is the direction we should be going in this body and that is the way I thought we would be going a couple of years ago, but it seems it depends on whose ox is being gored. But the best we could get in this instance is a modified open rule.

I emphasize again, it does provide for consideration of those amendments which had the most support in the Ways and Means Committee and which the Rules Committee felt should be considered on the floor of the House.

I would have preferred an open rule, but in this case we got a modified open rule.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOTT. I yield to the distinguished chairman of the committee, the gentleman from New York (Mr. DELANEY).

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to answer the gentleman's question. That is the rule requested by the Ways and Means Committee. Normally, any rule coming from the Ways and Means Committee is generally a closed rule or a gag rule because it is designed to do specific business, and if we would open it up we would open up the entire tax structure and everything else. Generally, the rules requested by the Ways and Means Committee are closed rules.

Mr. LOTT. I appreciate the chairman's comments. I would say to the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) that I wish he would join the Republicans in urging open rules be granted on the Ways and Means Committee bills as well as on others. I thought the caucus had made some effort in this direction 2 or 3 years ago, to have open rules. I do not know when we will give the Members the right to have the open rules they want. This is not a schoolyard. We are all equal Representatives, and that is the way we should be playing.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I too would prefer an open rule as a general rule in this House. But I think both the Ways and Means Committee and the Rules Committee have cooperated to provide a rule under which this body can address the principal items at issue in this bill. So I hope the rule will be speedily passed.

I add my voice to the acclaim being given to the distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee for his leadership in this field for three decades. It would be a fitting tribute to him if this bill, and the Vanik amendments, are passed.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. KETCHUM).

Mr. KETCHUM. Mr. Speaker and Members, I can assure you I will speak only on the merits of the rule. I thought that was what we were debating, and not the legislation.

As the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. LOTT) and the chairman of the Committee on Rules, the gentleman from New York (Mr. DELANEY) have indicated, this is a modified closed rule. It would be unusual for me to support a closed rule of any sort. However, the gentleman from New York (Mr. DELANEY) correctly points out that we are dealing with a specific subject area and, were this to be an open rule, we would be here for the next 3 or 4 months writing a tax credit bill for all sorts of things on the floor. So I completely support the rule.

The amendments that have been authorized are those which received a great deal of attention during the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means.

While the kudos are being passed out, I certainly do not feel that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. ULLMAN) should be ignored. Had it not been for the discussion that took place during the social security conference, I can assure the Members that this bill would not be on the floor today. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means should be congratulated for bringing it here and further congratulated for not having voted for the tuition tax credit bill which I happen to think is a bad one. But we will discuss that further today.

I am amazed that this body which is highly touted the world over as the greatest deliberative body in the world would have anyone stand up during the course of a discussion on a rule and say "I am going to support this amendment," or "I am going to support that amendment," when there has been no debate about them so far at all.

I certainly will hope that the Members will keep their minds open and listen carefully to the debate because it is a very important issue we are debating. I would specifically ask the Members for their most close attention when we reach the substitute, the Mikva-Ketchum amendment, because I think that the Members may well find that this will be the way out.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. MITCHELL).

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I too want to give credit to the distinguished members of the Committee on Rules and the Ways and Means Committee who brought this legislation before us. Unfortunately we have, in my mind, a bad rule. Under this rule there are only three known amendments that can be considered.

I share the concern with other Members over any kind of gag rule. I am talking to the well of the House of Representatives to oppose the rule, and I hope that we vote the rule down, and to oppose the legislation.

We will have a limited number of amendments before us, as my colleague the gentleman from California (Mr. KETCHUM) has indicated, to debate back and forth the number is limited, the opportunity to legislate is limited. Let me tell you why this rule is a dangerous rule. It is a gag rule, and in the legislation before us there is a section that says that tax credits are not to be considered as Federal assistance to the institutions. It goes on to say that any educational institution which enrolls a student for whom a tax credit is claimed under this act shall not be considered to be the recipient of Federal assistance under this act.

Now if that language prevails, then the institution has every right to flaunt title IX of the Civil Rights Act, to flaunt title VII of the Civil Rights Act, and to flaunt title VI of the Civil Rights Act.

By giving that kind of leeway to the institutions you give them the opportunity to flaunt civil rights legislation under the titles that I suggested. Further, my colleagues, you do not even have a chance—and I repeat—you do not even have a chance to amend that section of the bill. That is one reason why we ought to vote down the rule.

Let us look at this problem—possible flaunting of civil rights legislation—from another perspective. I understand that under the substitute this matter will be treated in terms of the Internal Revenue Service and its safeguards for civil rights enforcement. Even if that is true, and even if the amendments should prevail, you have got a situation where none of those amendments apply to this section of the legislation. You have got a situation in which one section of the rule says, "The devil with title VI, title VII, and title IX," and you have another section, if the amendments are passed, which would deal with civil rights enforcement. So at best you will have a situation of conflict between two sections of the law if any of those amendments pass. That being true you will open up the door, it seems to me, for endless litigation in terms of those who enforce the law, the agencies of enforcement, and in terms of the recipient institutions.

I would beg the Members—it is a rare, rare situation where I take to the well to urge a vote against a rule. I know I am fighting a losing battle; I realize that. This is such a popular idea in the minds of so many people. It is a sort of popular political gimmick, really, and I will talk about that more when we get into the general debate, because it really does not give relief for the people it presumes to give relief for.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to this legislation. I want to discuss with my colleagues the reasons why the Budget Committee did not make room in this resolution for tuition tax credits. One of the principal reasons is that tuition tax credits do very little to help middle-income college students.

FINANCIAL POSITION OF MIDDLE-INCOME FAMILIES

Let me say right off, I believe that my concern, and the concern of my colleagues on the Budget Committee, over the special financial needs of middle-income parents are fundamentally the same as those of you who prefer tuition tax credits. I am aware that college costs have risen sharply over the past several years. It costs, on average, $3,500 to send a child to college today; and the cost of attending a private college or university is even higher. While incomes have risen even faster than college costs, it is also true that inflation has cut deeply into most family budgets. Housing costs, food costs, automobile costs, gasoline costs and so on, are all up, and some items no doubt have risen more sharply over the past 5 or 10 years than incomes or college costs to middle-income families. I would be the last among you to contend that the financial crisis of middle-income families is an illusion.

TUITION TAX CREDITS VERSUS DIRECT GRANTS AND LOANS

Most of us then are in agreement in that we recognize the special financial plight of these families. But I am vigorously opposed to suggestions that tuition tax credits will make middle-income families appreciably better off. Judging from the great consternation in this House, among our constituents, and as reflected in the media, it is apparent that middle-income families have been misled on this notion.

The Budget Committee recommended $1.4 billion in budget authority to accommodate the House version of the Middle-Income Student Assistance Act on the merits of this proposal as compared with tuition tax credits.

Examine the difference in the benefit levels yourselves. As an example, a parent with income of $16,000 and total college expenses of $3,500 for a child would receive a tax offset or a refund of up to $150, 7 to 9 months following the student's enrollment in college, leaving at least $3,350 in unpaid expenses. However, under the proposed liberalization of the basic educational opportunity grants program in the Middle-Income Student Assistance Act, this same parent could be provided a grant of $800, leaving unmet expenses of $2,700. Can you seriously argue that a taxpayer would prefer a $150 tax offset in contrast to a $800 grant against tuition charges of $3,500?

Another interesting fact which has been given little attention is that most tuition tax credit bills before the Congress do not provide a flat credit for each eligible family. Most of the bills provide tax credits as a percentage of tuition costs, up to a certain limit, so if a student is sent to a private college, where tuition costs are higher, the student's family will receive a greater tax credit. This approach obviously favors higher income families who can afford private schooling.

While tax credit provisions are intended to help middle-income families, the amount per family is too small to be helpful. Moreover, close to a third of these expenditures could go to taxpayers in the upper 18 percent of the income distribution, seriously diminishing the effectiveness of the tax system to help those middle-income families who are in real need of assistance.

The Budget Committee recommended $5.4 billion for current higher education programs—an unprecedented 44 percent increase above fiscal year 1978 levels—which would provide grants of $600 to $800 to an additional 1.3 million students from families who earn between $16,000 and $25,000.

ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION PROVISIONS

Regarding elementary and secondary education provision in these bills, I am opposed to the Federal Government getting into the business of supporting private schooling. Our job is to provide leadership and financial assistance to public schools in their effort to provide all American children with equal educational opportunities. Tax credits would only serve to exacerbate the differences among elementary schoolchildren. It must be a family's choice to select—for whatever reasons it wishes — private schooling over public, but that family must be willing to bear the cost. I, for one, am not willing to disregard the Constitution on this subject merely to gain some political capital among my constituents.

SOMETHING FOR NOTHING?

Taxpayers have been given the impression that a tuition tax credit is something for nothing. But I remind you that that is not true. If we overload the circuits on this budget with items such as tuition tax credits which call for expanding future requirements, we are merely increasing the uncontrollability of future budgeting. This proposal would cost $800 million in tax expenditures in 1979; $1.2 billion in 1980 and up to $1.4 billion in 1981. During these years Congress will be faced with trying to compensate for inflation in current programs and enact new initiatives, yet trying to keep control of the deficit, while our revenue potential would decline due to such backdoor spending as tuition tax credits. Let me state that we can open the Treasury now, but in a short while we will be faced with concerns to raise revenues in order to pay for everything which everyone wants to have. Then it will not be something for nothing.

We all realize that this budget cannot provide everything which each of us would wish. Certainly there are compromises, but this budget reflects the best effort of my distinguished colleagues on the committee to treat each committee in this House as fairly as possible under the economic circumstances of today, and to target these funds in the most equitable fashion.

I would urge the Members of this House to recognize that tuition tax credits are a political gimmick, and a wholly inadequate one at that. I urge you, in the interest of middle-income families, to defeat this amendment.

Mrs. CHISHOLM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. I yield to the gentlewoman from New York.

Mrs. CHISHOLM. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland because I, too, realize the far-reaching implications and ramifications of this very important piece of legislation that we will be discussing here today, and because of the expedience of the political year in which we are all now living, I do not think we have given a great deal of depth and understanding to the substantive changes that will be occurring with respect to the common public school situation of this Nation.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. If I have more time left, let me deal with the rule again and some of the reasons why it ought to be defeated. I do not think we really know the full implications of this bill in terms of the budget process, in terms of how much revenue we will really lose.

Just a few short weeks ago, a few short days ago, we in this House finally voted, by a very close margin, a carefully crafted budget resolution, the first budget resolution. But under this rule, even if the chairman of the Committee on the Budget, or any member of the Committee on the Budget, found a flaw in any of those sections, a flaw which was dangerous to the budget process, we could not amend those flawed sections.

I urge the Members to vote down the rule on this legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELANEY. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I seek recognition simply to inquire of the distinguished chairman as to the procedures that were followed in the Committee on Rules when this matter was considered. I had made a request to the Committee on Rules to be notified about any meeting that occurred on the Tuition Tax Credit Act. Unhappily, that request was oral, not in writing. In any case, I was not notified, and I did find out later that there was a meeting on the matter, and that the meeting had been scheduled the previous evening at 9 o'clock p.m., which really did not give Members who had an interest much of an opportunity to know about the matter prior to its consideration by the Committee on Rules. So I simply wanted to make an inquiry about that.

Mr. DELANEY. I have no knowledge of any meeting at 9 o'clock p.m.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Not a meeting, I will say to the chairman, but the decision was made, as I understood it from the chairman's office, the preceding evening, and then the meeting itself took place the following morning. Am I misinformed?

Mr. DELANEY. As far as I am concerned, the gentleman is misinformed. I know nothing about it, and the gentlewoman from New York, Mrs. CHISHOLM, who is also a member of the committee, I think agrees there was no such thing.

Mr. MAGUIRE. All I can say, I will say to the chairman, is that is what I was told by the office of the Committee on Rules when I made an inquiry about it the following day. I just wonder if the chairman could tell me what are the procedures for notification of the Membership about meetings of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. DELANEY. Generally 24 hours. We give everyone 24 hours, and 48 hours over the weekend. We give everyone the information, and I do not know of a single instance where a person has requested to be heard in the Committee on Rules, even though we have had some 60 requests, where he has not been granted the opportunity to be heard. I know of no single instance.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I will say to the chairman I had asked to be notified. I will in the future, of course, make that request in writing. I hope that 24 hours minimum is always observed.

I thank the chairman.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 294, nays 97, not voting 43, as follows:

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. ULLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 12050) to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide a Federal income tax credit for tuition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GIAIMO). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. ULLMAN).

The motion was agreed to.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 12050, with Mr. ASPIN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. ULLMAN) will be recognized for 1 hour, and the gentleman from New York (Mr. CONABLE) will be recognized for 1 hour.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. ULLMAN).

Mr. ULLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 12050, the Tuition Tax Credit Act of 1978 is designed to provide taxpayers with financial assistance to meet the increasing costs of higher education. The bill provides a Federal income tax credit for tuition paid by a taxpayer for himself, his spouse, or his dependents to postsecondary vocational schools and undergraduate colleges and universities.

The credit is nonrefundable and is equal to 25 percent of the tuition paid for an eligible student. The maximum amount of credit which a taxpayer may claim with respect to tuition for an individual may not exceed $100 in calendar year 1978, $150 in calendar year 1979, and $250 in calendar year 1980. The annual maximum for each student keeps the revenue cost of the bill within reasonable levels.

Nevertheless, the credit provides substantial assistance of up to $250 of tax credit for the first $1,000 of tuition expense for each eligible student for whom a taxpayer pays tuition. In adopting a 5-percent credit with a per student maximum, the committee recognizes that a substantial portion of a student's tuition expenses still will be borne by the student's family and that the Government cannot completely relieve taxpayers of their personal responsibilities.

Only amounts paid for the education of a full-time student or a qualified part-time student may be taken into account for purposes of the credit. To be a qualified part-time student, a student must attend an academic undergraduate institution on at least a half-time basis for 8 calendar months. For any calendar year, only tuition payments made with respect to education furnished during that same calendar year are to be taken into account. No credit will be allowed for tuition paid for graduate school or recreational courses.

The credit may be claimed only for tuition and fees, including required course fees, paid by the taxpayer for enrollment or attendance at an eligible institution. It does not apply to amounts paid directly or indirectly for books, supplies, equipment, or personal living or family expenses.

The bill requires that tuition expenses taken into account for the credit must be reduced by certain tax-free scholarships, fellowships, and other nontaxable educational assistance. This offset rule prorates tax-free educational awards between tuition and other expenses directly connected with education which are ineligible for the credit except when an award must be used only for tuition.

No credit is allowed to a taxpayer who is claimed as a dependent by another person. In order to prevent "double dipping," the bill provides that no other tax deduction or tax credit—for example, the business expense deduction or child care credit—may be claimed with respect to any amount paid for tuition, except to the extent that the total tuition payment exceeds the amount necessary to claim the maximum tuition credit allowable under the bill. However, a taxpayer may elect not to claim the credit and instead may claim any other tax deduction or credit to which he or she is entitled.

The bill expressly provides that reductions in individuals' Federal income tax liability which are attributable to tuition tax credits may not be taken into account in determining their eligibility for, or the amount of their other individuals' benefits or assistance under, any federally funded educational assistance program. An educational institution which enrolls a student for whom a tax credit is claimed shall not, solely by virtue of that fact, be considered a recipient of Federal assistance.

The bill provides for expedited judicial consideration of the constitutionality of any of its provisions.

The bill applies to 3 taxable years. It takes effect August 1, 1978, with respect to amounts paid on or after that date for education furnished on or after that date. It terminates with respect to any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1980.

The Committee on Ways and Means estimates that this bill will reduce revenues by $16 million in fiscal year 1978, by $417 million in fiscal year 1979, by $780 million in fiscal year 1980, and by $896 million in fiscal year 1981.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, today finally the House has a chance, as it begins work on H.R. 12050, to support tax relief to assist parents of students in nonpublic schools in elementary and secondary education schools, and all students in postsecondary education.

H.R. 12050 is designed to give a little badly needed financial boost to students and their parents who have been burdened with heavily rising educational costs.

As the chairman described it, the bill will permit a tuition tax credit of one-quarter of the tuition up to a maximum of $250, when fully phased in in 1980.

There is, in my judgment, at the higher education level a minimum of controversy. Most people seem to understand the need for a tuition tax credit for higher education. It therefore seems likely that portion of the bill at least will be passed today.

The battleground today is likely to occur on the first amendment of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK), which will be offered for himself and myself. It seeks to add elementary and secondary education to the formula at the 25-percent rate but with a maximum in the second year of a $100 tax credit.

Mr. Speaker, the reason for this amendment is that students in the nonpublic sector have been declining more rapidly than in the public sector. In 1966, 13 percent of all elementary and secondary students were enrolled in nonpublic schools. Ten years later, in 1976, only 9.8 percent of all students attended nonpublic elementary and secondary education schools. That statistic alone shows the flight from nonpublic schools and tells us what has happened to American parents' freedom of choice to send their children to nonpublic schools.

Those who support this amendment, like myself, have no ill will toward the public system. Indeed, we support it and will continue to support it. We simply believe those parents who are willing to make a particular sacrifice ought to get a little encouragement so that they can continue to do so.

The bill is not calculated to lure students from public schools to nonpublic schools. It is designed simply to allow those who are in the nonpublic schools to be able to continue to make that choice for a few more years against very rapidly rising costs of education.

Recently I noted the Harris polls at the end of last month indicated the public overwhelmingly supported tuition credits. I hope the House will show that same kind of support.

There will be another amendment to increase the tax credit from 25 percent to 50 percent. I hope that amendment will be supported too. It seems to me that amendment favors students who are attending community colleges and land grant colleges as against those attending private colleges.

Mr. Chairman, I wholeheartedly support the Ways and Means Committee bill, H.R. 12050, and endorse the Vanik-Frenzel amendments which the Ways and Means Committee has recommended to be offered on the floor today.

Tuition tax credits are designed to provide a sorely needed financial boost to students and parents burdened with heavy educational costs. H.R. 12050, as reported, would permit taxpayers to subtract one-fourth of the tuition and required fees they pay to a maximum of $100 in 1978, $150 in 1979, and $250 in 1980. The credit is not refundable. The committee bill provides a tax credit for either a full-time to at least half-time undergraduate or post-secondary vocational student attending an HEW approved educational institution. The tax credit would not cover tuition paid by nontaxable scholarships or other educational assistance allowance. Tuition tax credits do not reduce a student's or parent's eligibility for other forms of Federal or State educational assistance.

The need for Congress to act is well demonstrated by the overwhelming increase in tuition costs which has spread to every level of education. Students wishing to attend private and public institutions of higher education are facing an ever increasing financial burden. The College Entrance Examination Board found that over the past 5 years, the average tuition and fees at private 4-year institutions, rose by 54 percent, at public 4-year institutions by 57 percent and at public 2-year institutions by 130 percent. These educational costs are well beyond the means of middle-income families, especially when more than one person in the family is in school at the same time.

Similar problems are facing low- and middle-income families who have children in nonpublic elementary and secondary schools. Here, parents are faced with a double burden. Not only must they pay tuition but they are also required to pay rising property taxes—taxes used to finance the public school system. The result is that fewer and fewer families are able to exercise their free choice to send their children to private schools.

These rising educational costs have taken an even heavier toll on lower and middle-income families. In the last 10 years there has been a constant drop in college attendance rates for students from families with incomes in excess of $10,000 (in 1967 dollars). Figures available from the Bureau of Census indicate that in 1967, 51.9 percent of 18- to 24-year-old dependent family members from families with incomes between $10,000 (or $17,050 in 1976 dollars) and $15,000 (or $25,575 in 1976 dollars) were enrolled in college. That percentage fell to 41.4 percent in 1974 and has since increased somewhat to 47.5 percent, still well below the 1967 figure. For those from families with incomes above $15,000 ($25,575, in 1976 dollars), the rate dropped from 68.3 percent in 1967 to 58.2 percent in 1976 after touching a low point of 56.6 in 1973. In the meantime, the attendance rate for those from families with incomes below $5,000 ($8,525 in 1976 dollars) has risen from 20 percent in 1967 to 22.4 percent in 1976. As the drop was not consistent across all income groups, the elimination of the draft is an insufficient reason for the drop in attendance rates. These figures present a clear picture—higher and higher price tags at colleges and universities are putting many students out of the classroom.

The heavy financial burden imposed on lower and middle-income families is an important factor in accounting for the declining enrollment and the closing of many nonpublic elementary and secondary schools. In 1966, 13 percent of all elementary and secondary school students in the United States were enrolled in nonpublic schools, while 10 years later 9.8 percent of all students studied in nonpublic elementary and secondary schools. The President's Commission on School Finance in a 1972 study, estimated that if many nonpublic schools closed, capital costs would increase from $4.7 billion to $10 billion. During the past decade, the total number of nonpublic schools declined from 19,946 to 17,950. This represents a loss of 10 percent or nearly 2,000 schools. Any further erosion in the nonpublic school system would seriously weaken our dual educational system and create a lopsided balance away from individual choices and toward governmental control.

Recent studies indicate that our lower and middle-income Americans—those to whom we make such lofty promises to lower the tax burden each even-numbered year—are paying more and more every year of our total tax load. Taxpayers earning $15,898 per year, and representing 25 percent of the total number paying personal income tax in this country, were paying 68.3 percent of the total tax load in 1970. In 1975, they were paying 72 percent of the total tax load. In 1977, it is estimated that they paid 75 percent of the total personal tax load. With the combination of higher tax rates and inflation, the heavier tax burden is continually reaching downward to include people who used to be in the lower middle income brackets. It seems only fair for Congress to allow these lower and middle-income families to keep a small portion of their own Federal income taxes in order to permit them to educate their kids.

With these kinds of facts before us, it is difficult, if not impossible, to determine that average income parents are not having great financial difficulties trying to provide an education for their children. Yet, a recent study attempted to refute the proposition that it is difficult to pay for college, harder in any case than it once was. What this study failed to consider, which the Library of Congress study pointed out, was the effects of the increased burden of taxes during the period 1967–76. While national median income has increased 78.8 percent during the 9-year period, after tax income rose only 66.8 percent during the same period. What this means is that the 74.2 to 76.7 percent increase in college tuition costs is well above the 66.8 percent increase in take-home pay—the money left over after taxes from which college expenses must be paid. The Library of Congress study further revealed that between 1967 and 1976, families with 18- to 24-year-old dependents saw Federal income taxes increase 103.9 percent, social security taxes increase 185.9 percent, and average State and local taxes, 152.5 percent. The end result is an increase in total taxes of 135.4 percent, thus challenging the former studies' implication that income has increased more than college costs.

Available on the floor today, to further illustrate this point, is an article written by Senator MOYNIHAN, "The Plight of Middle-Income Families." In the article is a remarkable letter from a constituent which explains the total unreality of a needs analysis estimate that the parent contribute $8,000 annually to his son's education. I urge my colleagues to peruse the article reprinted from the RECORD.

Part of the beauty of the tax credit approach is that it is well accepted and understood by nearly everyone. The tax laws are seen as a means of fairly distributing wealth of the country among the various income groups. Tax relief is provided already in such diverse areas as interest on home mortgages, medical, and business expenses, day care credits, earned income credits and employment credits, to name a few.

Tax credits are the most effective and least complicated means to provide student and parents financial relief from the soaring costs of education. Unlike our present Federal student aid programs, tax credits will not stimulate further expansion of the already massive and costly Federal bureaucracy. Bluntly stated, it makes absolutely no sense to increase our present bureaucracy which is already laden with massive problems—problems which will take years to straighten out. I might suggest to my colleagues that they need only to glance through the results of an independent study ordered by HEW Secretary Mathews in June 1976, to be aware of the multitude of insurmountable problems facing our current student aid bureaucracy. A summary of those problems was outlined in my Ways and Means Committee testimony which

Tax credits are the most direct and the most cost-effective means of providing student financial assistance. The cost of administering a tax credit is minute in comparison to our existing student aid programs. The best source of information here can be found in the HEW summary of President Carter's budget recommendation for fiscal year 1979, beginning on page 48. By simply adding up a few of the new requests and existing overhead costs, I arrive at $523.5 million. The Library of Congress estimates, taken from the fiscal year 1978 budget justification, indicate that the Federal administrative costs in the Washington, D.C., office for the five existing programs is somewhere in the neighborhood of an additional $100 million. This estimate reveals that the total does not include funds spent in the regional offices, nor costs for defaulted loans, nor does the estimate include the administrative expenses met by educational institutions out of their own funds.

With those administrative costs in mind, I am not anxious to increase the Bureau of Student Assistance's programs. The Bureau of Student Assistance's programs are surely in desperate need of reform to eliminate some of the administrative waste and redtape—not to mention the defaulted loans. I do not believe in multiplying waste by expanding the existing program, but I would be the first to oppose their elimination. Certainly they ought to be cleaned up.

Tuition tax credits actually support and complement our existing student aid programs. A recent study by the American Council on Education found that students with adjusted family incomes of less than $7,500, received approximately four-fifths of all BEOG and SEOG awards, about two-thirds of all college work study awards, about half of the national direct student loans, and about one-third of all guaranteed student loans. Students with adjusted family incomes of $15,000 or more received aid primarily through the guaranteed student loan program.

Students qualifying for existing Federal programs would still be eligible for the tuition tax credit. In fact, the committee report specifically states that the receipt of a tuition tax credit would not affect other forms of Government-provided student aid. Obviously, low-income students need the assistance provided under existing Federal programs, but we must not overlook the needs of the middle-income students. The House and Senate aid bills offer nothing but loans to 2.4 million college students with family incomes between $25,000 and $40,000, let alone to the 871,000 students from more prosperous families.

The concept of tuition tax relief extended to all educational levels has received widespread bipartisan support. Candidate Jimmy Carter supported it. In 1976 both Democratic and Republican platforms supported this lofty goal. The Harris poll, released this past week, indicates that by an 82 to 13 percent margin, Americans feel that "it is very hard for middle-class families to afford to send their children to school, and relief for them is long overdue"; by a 63 to 28 percent majority, feel that the proposed tuition tax cut will be "a way to get some tax relief to parents who send their children to private and parochial schools and have not been able to get any Federal aid up to now." Significantly, even among those with no children at tuition schools, an 80 to 14 percent majority sympathizes with the parents who pay for their children's education, according to the Harris poll.

The Gallup poll, released earlier, had similar findings. By a 51 to 34 percent margin, the public favors income tax credits rather than an expanded Federal aid program to help middle-income families pay for college expenses. A New York Times-CBS survey conducted April 3–7, found that 83 percent favored a tax break for college tuition costs. Obviously, the American people want to see the enactment of tuition tax credits.

While applying to all income levels, H.R. 12050 (according to the joint committee's estimates), 72 percent of all benefits will accrue to taxpayers whose incomes range in the $10,000 to $30,000 brackets; 9 percent of the benefits accrue to taxpayers in the range of $0 to $10,000; 14 percent to $30,000 to $50,000 and only 5 percent of the benefits will accrue to those taxpayers with incomes of $50,000 or more. With the addition of the Vanik-Frenzel amendments, the Congressional Budget Office estimates that 55 to 57 percent of the benefits will accrue to families whose incomes are under $25,000 and approximately 86 percent of the benefits will accrue to those families with incomes under $40,000. The Tuition Tax Credit Act of 1978 is not a bill to aid the rich.

In conclusion, the purpose of this legislation is to assist educational consumers' freedom of choice to satisfy their educational needs in a most cost effective approach. The bill, with the passage of the Vanik-Frenzel amendments, preserves our vast and diverse educational system which cannot survive in its present form without more choices for educational consumers. A tax credit method encourages freedom of choice, while at the same time, protects the consumer's financial privacy from further bureaucratic invasion.

Educational choice has been a popular and successful tradition in America, but inflation has robbed the lower and middle income Americans of any real choice. This is legislation whose time has come and I urge my colleagues to join with me in casting a favorable vote.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I want to take this time first of all to commend our distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. ULLMAN), the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, for agreeing to this procedure and expediting the hearing and his assistance in getting this legislation to the floor. I know he has some personal differences and disagreements with the tuition tax credit approach, but I think he is to be commended for letting the committee work its will and providing us this opportunity on the floor to deal with this legislation.

I also want to take this time to pay some special tribute to my colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL), who has been leading the effort for a tuition tax credit for many, many years. We have worked together as a team on the Committee on Ways and Means. We jointly sponsor the amendments which bear my name. So I certainly want to express to him at this time my appreciation for his efforts.

I urge the adoption of this bill along with the two amendments which we offer. The first of which, as the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) has indicated, would include the secondary and elementary schools, and the second which would raise the credit from 25 percent of tuition to 50 percent of tuition. With those amendments the bill would have a budgetary effect of $33 million in this fiscal year, $826 million in fiscal year 1979, and $1,415,000,000 in the year 1980. In 1981 the bill would have the effect of $1,569,000,000.

The tuition credit would be considerably cheaper and certainly less expensive than the administration's educational assistance program.

I think if you will look at the choreography, the administration rushed in to cut off consideration of tuition credits at the pass. The administration in its program requests $2.36 billion for fiscal year 1979 for a variety of things which would involve expenditures much more costly than those proposed by the tuition credits with the amendments that the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) and I sponsor.

Mr. Chairman, it was almost 24 years ago in March 1955, that I introduced my first bill for tuition credits. I think I have waited as long as any other Member in this House and I apologize that it has taken so long to reach this point.

We are considering the issue today primarily because of the ravages of inflation which have affected every household in America, and the spiraling educational costs, a situation of which every family is aware. The entire private educational system which has made a tremendous contribution in the diversity and the intelligence of national life is imperiled by these astronomical tuition charges which most American families, poor as well as everyone else, must pay.

In the 24 years that I have supported tuition credits, a great deal has happened to the private educational system. It has become more and more identified with and identical to the public system. The desegregation laws of the United States have applied to the private schools as well as the public schools. Rules relating to equal employment opportunities apply equally to both. The performance levels of the public school systems have been made mandatory on the private schools as well as the public. The main difference between the public and private schools is simply that public schools are supported entirely out of taxpayers' funds and yet, although in recent years private schools have become the beneficiaries of limited public educational support—and this is also in recognition of their enormous contributions to education—they are otherwise supported by private funds. Private schools select their teaching faculties out of the same source of trained personnel as do the public schools. In the private schools secular directors have decreased in number from 112,000 in 1960 to 55,000 in 1975. The number of lay teachers has increased from 44,000 in 1960 to 90,000 in 1975. Today in private schools the overwhelming number of teachers have a religious affiliation entirely different from the institution in which they serve. Religious teaching is optional in private education.

Let me say this, my son just recently graduated from a very fine Baptist College in Ohio. Ninety percent or more of the faculty of that college were not Baptists and the only religious training that he had in that college was a required course in comparative religion or philosophy. There was not one thing during his entire 4 years that had any religious impact—and maybe we are sorrier for that; I do not know. But his education for all practical purposes was exactly identical, to what it would have been in the State university.

At the secondary and elementary school level in most urban communities, and certainly in my own, the schools are open to every applicant. If the applicant is unable to pay at the low rate, they subsidize it, and he comes to school free, and the tuition charges are waived. When these charges are imposed, they usually suspend the imposition of tuition if there is more than one child going to school at the same time. The school provides quality education which costs the taxpayers six times less than the same education in the public school system.

I might say at the present time at the secondary or elementary school level, private schools are almost 40 to 50 percent utilized by minority groups. For all practical purposes, it is the same kind of school; it is just a competitive school. In major American cities private school students come from principally the poor as well as the lower middle-income families.

In Los Angeles, for example, 53 percent of the private elementary school enrollment is from minority groups. Private schools have complied with integration—this is important—the private schools of America have complied with the integration requirements of the United States law much more quietly, much more precisely, and much more effectively than most of our public schools. They were first to integrate. They have done a noble job. Tax tuition credits proposals realistically reflect this fact of life about public or private education in America today.

If we adopt the amendments that are offered by myself and the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL), 83 percent of the benefits of this act will flow to families in America where the total family income is below $28,000. What is $28,000? That is an income of $14,000 apiece for two workers in the family. Is that affluence? Certainly, 17 percent of the benefits may flow to people above that level, but under the President's plan 20 or 25 percent of the total expenditure is going to be spent on bureaucrats, on paper, on redtape, to decide who is going to be eligible for it.

I want to tell the committee that I think the benefit ratio of the tuition credit is infinitely superior to what we get under that alternative program. This is an important thing. Competition and the opportunity for a choice are a unique part of the American system. The private school system complies with all of the standards and requirements of the public school system, while providing an opportunity for a little competition in educational quality and in cost control. From the standpoint of cost containment, the private school system in America has done an exemplary job of making do with very little, and this competition, I will say, Mr. Chairman, has served to be some kind of restraint on what otherwise would be a no-limit control on what would be spent in the public sector.

I think, frankly, someone is going to raise the issue about the question of constitutionality. I am not trying to prejudge or determine what the U.S. Supreme Court is going to do, and I do not think our actions ought to be based on any guesses or suppositions about what the Court is going to do. That is the Court's business. We will deal with that problem when and if it occurs. But I see no difference in tuition credits for children in elementary schools or secondary schools or colleges. I think the issue is the same.

I have studied the whole field of tax credits and investment credits, special credits to special groups of people who do special things for which we provide incentives. I do not think there is going to be any problem with the Court.

As everyone knows—and this is an important point—taxpayers' support for public education is on the wane.

People are getting very discouraged and disturbed by the insensitivity of the public school system. In my community the voters have time and time again rejected bond issues. It is very possible that in my community the only schools that may be operating soon will be the private schools, because the voters have rejected support because they do not like or approve in the public system.

Now, I happen to believe that a tuition credit is going to make people who use private schools support the public school system. I think if they get this incentive, they are going to realize they have an obligation to provide support for public education as well.

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield, just for the purpose of clarifying this last statement?

Mr. VANIK. I will be glad to do that when I finish my statement and I will give the gentleman every opportunity.

Mr. RANGEL. And I want to thank the gentleman.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I want to point out that if the tuition credit is adopted, I believe that those who enjoy the tuition credit are going to provide the margin of support—the margin of support which is essential to provide for public school bond issue support in the communities where it is so critical an issue. I think that support is essential if we are going to go forward and get the necessary support we need for our public school system.

America has been made strong through competition. We have been successful as a nation because we have tried to be fair to minorities. The tuition credit is of vital importance to millions of people, tens of millions of people at any given moment in our history.

As I said, 83 percent of our families with incomes under $28,000 or $30,000 will utilize the credit. They are not wealthy people. They are just people who need some help at this particular time. Every $100 that we lose in tax revenues through the tuition credit will be matched by $600 or $700 of private spending. No other—no other Federal tax incentive program can claim so high a benefit ratio. One and a half billion dollars in tax credits will be supported by $24.5 billion of private spending. You point out another Federal program with an incentive that produces so much spending and participation in the private sector.

Now, I think any system in America which educates helps all America, and adds to the resources of this country in its most critical area.

I say to you that the tuition credit, in my judgment, the time has come for it and it is an educational bargain for all America.

Now I will be very happy to yield to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from New York (Mr. RANGEL), who very anxiously wants me to help the city of New York in another few days.

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Chairman, I think I will wait. I thank the gentleman for yielding, but if the support we are going to get for the city of New York is going to be explained in the same terms as this bill is being explained to help the public school system, then my city is in worse trouble than I suspected.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I want the gentleman to know that I will do everything I can to help the city of New York. I know its special problems.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of this bill. However, I strongly oppose one of the amendments to it which will be offered later today—the amendment to change the 25-percent tax credit to a 50-percent credit.

H.R. 12050 sets up a 3-year program. But when its expiration date approaches, the 96th Congress could decide to extend it. Even though the credits in H.R. 12050 provide only token assistance, the amounts contained in subsequent years might take on more meaningful dimensions. Our legislative decisions now might well establish the foundation for an ongoing, permanent program.

In light of this possibility, it is crucial for us to preserve the 25-percent credit provided for in H.R. 12050. It helps reduce the tuition gap between costly and inexpensive schools. The 50-percent credit, on the other hand, maintains the gap and makes the high-priced schools proportionately more expensive.

Both percentages distribute benefits among income groups in about the same pattern. But under the 25-percent credit, families with heavy tuition burdens will receive proportionately more relief than families with lighter burdens. The 50-percent credit provides just about the same amount for everyone, regardless of relative need.

The 25-percent credit is not likely to have undesirable side effects such as encouraging schools to increase their tuitions at a faster rate than normal or inducing parents to abandon public schools. A 25-percent credit clearly would be assistance to parents with the heavy cost of taking advantage of what remains of our pluralistic educational system.

Finally, given the maximum credits permitted under this legislation, the 25-percent credit would cost less than would the 50-percent credit. With the return of double-digit inflation, this is an important consideration.

Later today, I plan to speak at greater length about the merits of the 25-percent credit, and I urge the House to consider the long-term implications of the choice before us.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New York (Mr. RANGEL).

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this bill, because obviously, if both sides prevail here, then the Members of the House would not know exactly what they are voting for.

There are some Members here who have indicated that they support this legislation, because it improves the quality of education. Well, I doubt seriously whether any Member of this House would believe that we can improve education in what is basically a tax bill, and if there is anything that is going to be "improved," it will be the amounts of money that the private institutions involved in education can make.

There are others who are talking about the idea that this has nothing to do with education but has everything to do with giving relief to our middle-income people. I suggest that this does not even provide for relief to middle-income people. First, if the institutions are going to raise their tuition fees, then certainly the parents of the children would not be able to see any relief; and second, if we are talking about middle-income people, why are we segregating those people who have no children or who have no husband or no spouse involved in education?

So this means that only a certain percentage, a privileged few who have children in school, would be the beneficiaries of this tax relief.

The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) has spoken at great length about how this bill is really going to help the public school system. He indicated, I believe, that if we give this help to the private sector, if we give this help to middle-income America, and if we give this help to those people who are able to get their children out of public schools, then sooner or later those people will have enough compassion to support the bond issues that are necessary to carry on the public school system.

I submit to the Members that the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) is perhaps correct. This bill has brought together the black and the white segregationalists, the Jews, the Gentiles, the Catholics, and the Protestants, because there is the smell of dollars and cents in the air, but if we ever get anything for the public school system, it will be after that system is closed. This does follow the lines the way this country is going.

This bill does means that if people no longer want to send their kids to the public school system, they do not have to. But there is nothing in this bill that gears itself to the poor people in this country, and I submit that the middle-income people will get very little out of it.

Mr. Chairman, what I do know is this: This will now allow even the poor people to segregate themselves. It allows us to distinguish between those who have to send their children to the public school system and those who really have a private school system that they can use as a vehicle. In order to receive any benefits from this bill, people must first have a tax liability, and if they do not have a tax liability, then they are chained to the public school system. I wish that there were something that we could do to improve the public school system.

After all, this is the system that State governments have an obligation to maintain. They have a right to make certain there are such institutions for learning. But now, if we are going to turn it over to the churches, to the synogogues, and to the private school sector, then I hope that every kid in this country will have the right not to have to depend on the income of his parents, and perhaps we can return to a voucher system where we can have real competition between the private and public school sectors and even have competition within the public school sector itself.

I think this bill, more than anything else, separates the "haves" and the "havenots." I do understand that those who have recently reached that point in their lives where they can afford to take their kids out of the public school system would welcome this relief from the Federal Government. But I want the Members to know that this has nothing to do with giving, giving tax relief to the middle income. It has nothing to do with education. But it has a lot to do with a lot of political considerations in saying that we have reached a point that those who support the public school system are not as politically active as those who support the private school system.

So what we are doing is increasing the tuition. And I daresay that in a year we can go to our constituents who are asking for this bill and ask how much they saved and how much they benefited as a result of the Congress passing this bill; and I tell the Members that probably the answer will be that they did not benefit but that the private school system did.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in further opposition to H.R. 12050, the Tuition Tax Credit Act. Whether the Federal Government should subsidize the payment of tuition in private elementary and secondary schools, as well as in post-secondary schools, by the means of a tuition tax credit has caused much debate throughout the country and especially in Congress. There is no issue upon which I have received more correspondence both from within my district and from across the Nation. Not only must this issue be considered in light of our basic public policy of providing a free education for all Americans, but it also goes to the heart of the constitutional prohibition on separation of church and state.

In fiscal year 1978, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare will spend approximately $10.5 billion on education assistance. Of that, $6 billion is allocated as subsidies for elementary and secondary schools and the other $4.5 billion is designated for grants to post-secondary and graduate educational institutions as well as grants to low-income students and educational loan interest subsidies.

The tuition tax credits contained in H.R. 12050 would, as we all know, provide a credit equal to 25 percent of tuition paid by a taxpayer up to a maximum credit of $100 in 1978, $150 in 1979, and $250 in 1980 for each student in post-secondary educational institutions and would cost approximately $780 million in fiscal year 1980 when fully implemented. The Congressional Budget Office estimates that some 78 percent of the college and graduate school tax credits would go to benefit families with incomes of over $15,000, with some 52 percent of those benefits going to families with incomes over $20,000. I ask you, are those the people who really need assistance?

Recently, the President proposed, and the House Education and Labor Committee passed, a middle-income assistance plan which would cost $1.3 billion. This proposal would expand the basic education opportunity grant (BEOG) and the guaranteed student loan (GSL) programs as well as the college work-study program. BEOG and GSL are the primary ways in which the Federal Government provides assistance to students who need help. Under the new proposal, BEOG would provide an outright grant of $1,800 (current grant is $1,600) a year for families with an income of $8,000 or less. This grant would be phased out based upon a family's ability to contribute to a student's education to a minimum grant of $250 for a family with an income of $30,000. The GSL program would also be expanded so that all families, regardless of income, would be eligible for a Federal interest subsidy on education loans. Families with incomes of $30,000 or less would pay no interest while the student was in school. However, families with incomes over $30,000 would pay interest during school years. All loans would not become due until after graduation.

The distinct advantage of the BEOG over tuition tax credits is that it is targeted to those Americans who really need help.

Tuition tax credits, on the other hand, are too broad-based and will tend to disproportionately benefit high income families. At the same time, such a program can only serve to erode support for programs which target assistance to needy people, because continuation of both programs would be too costly. One should not forget that a tax credit can only benefit families which have enough tax liability to be offset by the credit. Many experts have said that, were the general credit enacted, the tendency in educational institutions would be to eat up the benefits by increasing tuition. This would result in no assistance for middle-income families and would tend to freeze poorer Americans out of the college market.

We all know that many of our public schools are not what we would like them to be, but providing tuition tax credits can only serve to reduce support for assistance to public schools. Less educational funds will mean continued deterioration of our public schools. In fact, were the Vanik amendment concerning tax credits for elementary and secondary schools to become law, the Federal government, which currently provides $60 per private school pupil (for textbooks, transportation, health, and therapeutic services) would be subsidizing private school students at a rate of $160 ($100 credit plus $60 grant) which is more than the $128 Federal subsidy we now provide public school students. Such a subsidy would mean the difference between continued existence and extinction for many all white private academies which were established in order to avoid integration.

Besides the disproportionate Federal subsidy to private education that a tuition tax credit would represent, such a provision would violate the basic constitutional prohibition of the first amendment that "Congress should make no law respecting an establishment of religion * * *" Upon numerous occasions, this has been interpreted by the courts to exclude any direct subsidies to religious schools which cannot objectively be determined to be unrelated to religion.

Our public schools have traditionally served as the vehicle by which we assimilate young people into our society. At the same time, they teach the most basic principle of democracy: People must learn to work and live together. If we provide economic incentives for parents to pull their children out of public schools, we will develop stratified social classes where the rich and middle-class will rarely come into contact with the poor. We would all be better served if we concentrated our available education dollars on delivering basic skills such as writing, reading, and arithmetic.

The National Office for Black Catholics in their February issue printed the following editorial which raises some significant questions from the point of view of those who are deeply involved in parochial schools. I asked all my colleagues to heed the words of this editorial which appeared in the February issue of Impact and vote against any form of tuition tax credits. The text of that article is as follows:

SUBSIDIZED SEGREGATION

When the Senate Finance Committee reported the tuition tax credit bill it should have stirred ambivalent sentiments among black Catholics. As Catholics, burdened by the high tuition costs of sending each child to a Catholic school, they undoubtedly hailed it as a great blessing, a welcome relief.

But as blacks, mindful of the long, bitter fight for public school integration, they should have been aware of the loopholes it will provide for those determined to thwart the concept of integrated schools. Parents determined to sidestep school integration will now be aided and abetted by having half the costs paid.

We have read Secretary Califano's objections—unfair to the overburdened taxpayers with children in public schools—already supporting public schools via taxes, they will now be called on to subsidize parochial and private schools—and they won't be getting that $500 tax rebate every year. Don't you believe it! The status of their children's education will change post haste, en masse, from public to "private." (Remember the "private" schools that sprung up in Virginia and other southern states to avoid integration?).

Now with the Moynihan ("benign neglect")-Packwood tuition tax credit bill, they will be paid to change! As a street-wise friend of mine put it so succinctly: "Flight from the niggers will now be subsidized!"—RWC.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. KETCHUM).

Mr. KETCHUM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this bill. I will, when the time permits, oppose two of the three amendments that will be offered. I will explain my reasons then.

Mr. Chairman, I think I can say, without fear of contradiction, that there is not a single Member of this body who has ever spoken to a group in his or her district regarding taxes and the tax code who has not indicated that they believe in tax simplification; but more than anything else, in tax equity. If the Members believe what they have told their constituents about tax equity, there is no way they can vote for this bill.

Take these three groups of people into consideration: Single people; childless couples; retired people, those who have already put their children through school.

Depending upon the State in which you live, they pay, first, property taxes to support public education, and they assume that as a responsibility.

Second, again depending upon the State in which you live, those three groups of people pay State income taxes which support public education, and they do not necessarily complain about that.

Third, in all cases those individuals pay Federal income taxes, again to support education, and there are very few complaints about that.

But to go to those three groups of people again and create a further inequity in the tax code by saying, "you have supported and supported and supported, and now we will come to you again and ask you to subsidize us, those of us with children in private schools or children in colleges," is to me grossly unfair and inequitable and unsupportable by anyone who has ever called for equity and fairness in the tax code.

When the time arrives and the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA) and myself comes before us, we will try to explain the very best we can that the tax deferral offers 10 times the help for those impacted by having children in college. Not only that, it is not inequitable or unfair to the three groups of people I mentioned, because those tax deferrals will have to be repaid over a 10-year period. As a matter of fact, our Treasury will benefit.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BURKE), a member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BURKE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) for yielding this time to me since I realize this question is so crucial.

Mr. Chairman, there have been many bills submitted to this body which are designed to address the needs of families who are faced with increasingly prohibitive educational costs. The number of proposals reflects the growing concern that we can wait no longer in answering this need, the breadth of scope of the proposals is testimony to the controversy which has developed in choosing the best way to come to grips with the problem.

Today we are discussing tuition tax credit legislation which I believe is the most responsive and equitable solution to this critical need. Middle-income families, in particular, feel the bite of inflation chewing away at their available resources. We cannot afford to let education become a commodity accessible only to the upper classes.

A recent New York Times-CBS news survey revealed that 83 percent of those questioned favored a tax break for college tuition costs. A Gallup poll confirmed that the demand is for relief at the tax level, not an increased bureaucratic system offering little more than a loan program for most families.

A major shortcoming in the alternative administration financial aid program is that it ignores the needs of families who have tuition costs at the elementary and secondary level. Considerable controversy has developed over tax credits for these students; claims that such legislation would serve only the well-to-do. Yet 82 percent of all private elementary and secondary school students live in families earning less than $30,000 per year. We cannot impose a stranglehold on the very institutions which are providing a diversity in our educational system. It is crucial that we offer a freedom of choice in education. We must maintain the healthy competition which fosters vitality in public and private institutions. A disproportionately high percentage of the enrollment decline in elementary institutions has been felt in the private system. Inclusion of elementary and secondary tuition costs does not tilt the scales in favor of private schools, nor does it create a disincentive for public schools. Rather, it will serve to guarantee the existence of a dual system.

I strongly believe that we have found in tuition tax credit legislation, an efficient and equitable relief from the increasingly burdensome expense of education costs, and hope that the needs of elementary and secondary students will not be neglected.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. RAILSBACK).

Mr. RAILSBACK. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, I rise in support of H.R. 12050, the Tuition Tax Credit Act of 1978, and the so-called Vanik-Frenzel amendments which will be offered for our consideration later today.

The need to provide relief from the increasing burden of educational costs is clearly evident. The spiraling costs of educating our children in public and nonpublic schools is reaching a point of crisis. According to the Joint Committee on Taxation, the average annual cost of attending college has increased by 56.6 percent in just the last 5 years. Supporting one child through undergraduate school can cost parents from $10,000 to $25,000, a heavy financial burden indeed. The picture at the elementary and secondary level is equally bleak. At one private high school in my district, for example, the tuition has increased by 100 percent in only 8 years.

Regrettably, the burden of these skyrocketing educational expenses has proven unbearable for many. This is particularly true for those with children enrolled in private educational institutions. The obligation of paying full taxes to support public schools, coupled with the tuition costs of private schools, has placed these parents in a tough financial dilemma.

The result, of course, is that fewer and fewer families are able to send their children to private schools. U.S. Commerce Department statistics indicate that private elementary schools have lost 35 percent of their enrollment in the last decade. Private high school registrations have dropped nearly 13 percent, despite the fact that total secondary enrollments around the country rose by some 18 percent during the same period.

What is most alarming about these statistics, in my opinion, is their illustration of a growing restriction on freedom of choice in education. It is my firm belief that one of America's greatest strengths has been the freedom of its citizens to choose an education that suits their needs, aspirations, and beliefs. But as Chief Justice Warren Burger stated in his dissenting opinion in the Nyquist case:

> However sincere our collective protestations of the debt owed by the public generally to the parochial school systems, the wholesome diversity they engender will not survive on expressions of good will. Committee for Public Education v. Nyquist, 413 U.S. 756, 805 (1973).

I suggest that the right to select a school of your choice is on the verge of becoming meaningless when the only way it can be executed is through great financial sacrifice.

H.R. 12050, the Tuition Tax Credit Act of 1978, can go far in restoring this freedom of choice in education. In my opinion, it is not a question of the Federal Government perpetuating private schools. Rather, it is an attempt to stabilize and preserve an educational system older than the country itself. Tuition tax credit is a simple, straightforward approach to this problem which would provide equitable treatment and very needed relief to millions of taxpayers. Unlike some other proposals, adoption of this concept would necessitate no further expansion of the already massive Federal bureaucracy. Instead of collecting taxes from the American citizen only to return it to them reduced by administrative costs, a tuition tax credit would provide a direct reduction in their tax bill correlated to their educational expenses. It would require only a one-line entry on tax returns and would insure the privacy of family finances.

I encourage my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to support this legislation and the Vanik-Frenzel amendment to include private elementary and secondary educational institutions within its coverage.

I recognize, of course, that some have suggested that an amendment to include private elementary and secondary schools within the coverage of H.R. 12050 would be unconstitutional. I respectfully disagree with that assessment and assert, to the contrary, that this proposal does in fact pass constitutional muster.

The Supreme Court has made it clear that in order to survive a first amendment establishment clause challenge to its constitutionality:

> A statute must have a secular legislative purpose, must have a principal or primary effect that neither advances nor inhibits religion, and must not foster an excessive government entanglement with religion. Wolman v. Walter, — U.S. —, 53 L. Ed. 2d 714, 725 (1977).

Certainly inclusion of private elementary and secondary schools within the tuition tax credit concept passes the first and third elements of this three-pronged test without serious challenge. It would be difficult to argue that the purpose of such legislation, which is to ease the increasingly heavy financial burden of educating a family while preserving freedom of choice in education, is anything but secular. Similarly, this approach to educational assistance avoids a charge of excessive Government entanglement with religion by creating no relationships between the Government and any religious organization or institution.

Those contending that the proposed amendment fails the test of constitutionality, because its principal effect is to advance religion point to the Supreme Court's decision in Committee for Public Education v. Nykuist, 413 U.S. 756 (1973). In Nyquist, the Court considered and held invalid a New York statute that provided tax relief to the parents of children attending nonpublic elementary and secondary schools, 85 percent of which are church-affiliated. It is essential to note, however, that the Nyquist case did not involve a Federal tuition tax credit program and that the issue presented for the Supreme Court's review is readily distinguishable from the constitutional question raised by this amendment and this legislation.

In its opinion, the Court clearly did not close the door on a tuition tax credit broadly available to students at all educational levels. In fact, the Court specifically reserved its decision on a program of assistance made available without regard to the sectarian-nonsectarian or public-nonpublic nature of the institution. 413 U.S. at 782–3 n.38. Additionally, the Court expressly stated that the "narrowness of the benefited class would be an important factor" in determining the validity of similar programs in future cases; 413 U.S. at 794. H.R. 12050, as amended by the Vanik-Frenzel proposal, would expand the benefited class far beyond that invalidated in Nyquist by providing tax credits for students attending any accredited private elementary or secondary schools as well as all post-secondary educational facilities without regard to their sectarian-nosectarian nature. Provision for such an expanded class clearly meets the second element of the three-pronged test of constitutionality.

It is for these reasons that I believe that an amendment to include private elementary and secondary educational facilities within the coverage of H.R. 12050 would be upheld by the U.S. Supreme Court. This conclusion is shared by a number of constitutional scholars as well. I urge you, therefore, to carefully consider this amendment on the merits and to support its adoption when the vote is taken. It is at the elementary and secondary level where the need for tuition tax credit is greatest. Whether or not the Vanik-Frenzel amendment is adopted, I encourage my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to support final passage of H.R. 12050, the Tuition Tax Credit Act of 1978.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. COUGHLIN).

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, many of us have waited for a very long time, indeed, to see this bill come up. I realize that the battle is not over, but I do want to thank my colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee and on the Rules Committee for bringing this bill before us.

Yesterday I put into the RECORD a recent poll by pollster Lou Harris which indicated that by a 65- to 25-percent ratio the American public favors the enactment of tuition tax credits and even a very substantial majority of those who have children only in public schools favor the enactment of a tuition tax credit.

Yesterday I also put into the RECORD a very strong endorsement by the Congress of Racial Equality, a major civil rights organization, strongly supporting tuition tax credits as means of aiding the poor and minorities in addition to the middle-income people.

Mr. Chairman, it gives me great pleasure to be speaking to my colleagues today of my strong support for the tuition tax credit proposal which is now before us. Many of us have worked long and hard for the chance to see the Members of the House given the opportunity for a direct vote on tuition tax legislation as the most simple, direct, and fair form of desperately needed relief for the middle-income families burdened with the problem of soaring educational costs.

I first began my efforts on behalf of education tax credits 8 years ago in the 91st Congress with the introduction of a bill which would have provided income tax credits for higher education. Eighty-seven of my colleagues joined me in cosponsoring the same bill in the 92d Congress, and during the same year I first sponsored a bill which included parents of students attending elementary and secondary schools. In the following Congress, the number of cosponsors of some form of tuition tax credits for higher education rose to 103, and I am pleased to say that during this session, over 250 Members have sponsored 170 bills to provide some form of tuition tax relief.

Last fall, the House was allowed for the first time to show its overwhelming support for the concept of tuition tax credits as 311 Members voted in favor of my amendment to the second concurrent budget resolution which insured the availability of $175 million for a system of tax credits for higher and vocational education expenses. The continuing broad, bipartisan support for tuition tax credits was once again demonstrated earlier this month by the 227 to 136 vote in favor of the Coughlin/Luken amendment to the first budget resolution allowing for the funding of a tuition tax credit program in fiscal year 1979. The Senate has approved some form of education tax relief six times since 1967, while today is the first time that the House has been allowed a direct vote on the merits of this issue.

The tuition tax credit bill before us now, H.R. 12050, the Ways and Means Committee bill, provides for a 25-percent tax credit for tuition paid for higher education expenses up to maximum of $100 per person for the first year for full-time and part-time students who are enrolled for 8 calendar months in an undergraduate college for at least one-half of the academic program required for a full-time student at the same school. While I would prefer that the maximum amount of the credit be raised to at least $220, unfortunately that is not permitted under the rule. I, nevertheless, reiterate my wholehearted support for this bill.

I also voice my support for the first two amendments which have been allowed under the rule. The first amendment would extend the tax credit to parents of students enrolled in nonpublic elementary and secondary schools. The maximum amount of the credit will be limited to $50 in 1978 in $100 in 1979 and 1980. This would be a well-deserved measure of relief to hard-pressed middle-income families trying to educate their children. Few people realize that 51 percent of children attending private elementary and secondary schools are from families with incomes less than $15,000 per year and 71 percent are from families with incomes below $25,000 per year. Fewer and fewer parents are able to afford the choice of a private education—the U.S. National Center for Educational Statistics projects that by 1984, 2.1 million fewer students will be attending nonpublic elementary and secondary schools than were in 1965.

In addition to the burden that nonpublic schools lift from tax supported school systems, there are valid reasons for supporting diversity and choice in education. I do not believe a single monolithic school system is in the Nation's best interest. There are also valid reasons for supporting competition and cost comparisons among educational institutions.

A tax credit for elementary and secondary education would help preserve this diversity and competition in our educational system. It would not be destructive of public schools because the credit is limited in amount and parents would still have to pay 50 and 75 percent of tuition. I would personally prefer to any alternative.

The second amendment would increase the credit from 25 to 50 percent of tuition. I would personally prefer to see a larger credit. This, however, is not permitted under the present bill and since the maximum credit is so small, I would favor the increase from 25 to 50 percent in order to give the credit greater impact.

Tuition tax credits are an idea whose time has come. Last year, Secretary Califano said that a $250 tuition tax credit was not needed and was too expensive. This year the administration has endorsed a $250 grant program for middle-income students. Under a grant approach, a major share of the funds would go into increasing administrative and bureaucratic overhead, resulting in a net loss of direct aid to the needy student. I believe that simple pumping more Federal money into the present problem-ridden and patchwork Federal education assistance programs would not be the most effective use of the taxpayers' dollars.

We currently allow tax deductions for child care and charitable contributions to schools. President Carter has proposed an insulation tax credit. Businesses are allowed deductions for employee education expenses. Why should private citizens not be allowed to keep some of their own tax dollars for education at that time in their lives when they are under most financial stress—rather than sending those dollars to the Federal Government in the form of increasing taxes and then hoping to get a few of them back in the form of Federal assistance. A tuition tax credit program makes the most sense for the American taxpayer—I strongly urge your support for this worthwhile legislation.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. PICKLE), my distinguished colleague and cosponsor of a very important tax amendment.

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the chairman's yielding and I take pleasure in working with him on certain items of legislation, but not with respect to this bill, because I support our public school system and I am opposed to this bill as written.

From an educational standpoint, and from a tax viewpoint, this bill is one of the most important we will debate. It foreshadows most of the issues we face this decade and will have far-reaching consequences far beyond this day of reckoning. This legislation could shape the future educational policy of this country, and this policy is the very foundation of a free republic. I support our public school system, and am opposed to this bill as written.

Will we give public tax money to private institutions? It is not enough to say they are nonprofit institutions. It will be tax credit for institutions in competition with free public institutions of this Nation.

Some basic points must be made. First, is the question of policy. Should we take Federal tax money, money from every taxpayer in America and divert a portion of it to private educational institutions. We must ask ourselves, are we ready to close out our present approach to education? Should we be frightened to contemplate a disbursement of that fund to other types of private schools, which are without doubt qualified and respected schools of learning? Or, is our present policy correct and must we protect it at all costs?

Second is the question of the cost of the program if adopted. Cost estimates have ranged from $780 million if the bill the Ways and Means Committee reported was adopted without amendments to $4.5 billion in 1980 if elementary and secondary private schools are included. This is a question that concerns many of us even as much as the educational policy question. The fact is we are running an annual $50 billion deficit, and have had such a deficit for 5 years. So, can we afford this additional $4 to $5 billion?

Furthermore any tax analyst, or budget analyst, who is a realist must honestly say that, whatever the cost estimates are today, this figure will grow to an astronomical figure. I predict it will be much more expensive than revenue sharing.

It is my belief that we should strengthen and help the public school system not necessarily as we have known that system in the past, but the principle of public school education. We cannot afford a deficit of from $5 to $10 billion or more for the next 10 years.

I must say, however, that this issue has been one which has been advanced in a respected and acceptable manner. There have not been marches on the Capitol, threats, or reprisals. It is a broad-based issue involving both church groups and private nonprofit groups. It has been a steady, unrelenting advocacy.

The argument is that a great many pay public taxes and never get any benefit for their children's education. These people are justified in making this argument, and it is not enough to say that they forfeit that right by choosing private institutions. The most fundamental, deep-rooted problems are in public schools today. This has to be corrected or redirected lest our whole educational systems tumble over each other in the abrupt disarray.

It does us little good to point the finger at the cause of these problems, but those on the Federal level must admit that some of our Federal regulations have augmented these problems—forced Federal busing, needs tests in aid programs, compliance with hundreds of needless forms, complications of loan programs, the flirtations with a quota system, abolishing prayer in school, and the overall expectancy that the Federal Government knows best how to run a school system. As a result of this overpowering Federal presence private nonprofit schools have grown, and may well continue to grow unless we can find better answers to problems that plague our public schools.

Perhaps we should admit that these private schools will continue to grow ever if Federal pressures are removed simply because parents prefer to have smaller, direct, and religious influence. This aspect of the controversy is not merely a scramble for the dollar. It is basic and deeply important. Public school administrators must recognize this fact.

But on the other hand, for 200 years our public school system has made us the most enlightened citizens in the world. We ought not to inflict deep body wound on our public school institution in order to give tax relief to others. This is not even necessarily the best way to help our private schools. If we adopt this proposal, our public school system will never be the same.

Perhaps we have expected too much from our public schools. We have expected them in addition to teaching the traditional reading, writing, and arithmetic to teach people how to live together and how to solve some of our most grave social problems. In an earlier time we expected to solve some of these problems through the home and through the church.

These are important goals and no one wants to see a change in our policy that would encourage the public schools to become a dumping ground for problem children.

For all these reasons I am voting against H.R. 12050, the Tuition Tax Credit Act of 1978, and against the amendment that would increase the credit from 25 to 50 percent and against the amendment that would extend the tuition tax credit to elementary and secondary education. I have always been most interested in education, particularly public education and consider it a basic right of every individual. For this reason I supported the administration plan that would add to three existing Federal programs. I also support, but with some reservations, Mr. MIKVA's amendment in the nature of a substitute that would provide for deferral of Federal income tax for tuition paid to postsecondary vocational schools and colleges.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from California (Mr. DON H. CLAUSEN).

Mr. DON H. CLAUSEN. Mr. Chairman, honest people can conscientiously differ in their basic approach to improving our society and in particular our educational systems. I genuinely respect those people who differ from my view and conclusions and I hope others will respect my thoughts and position on the matter before us today. This is the essence of functioning democracy.

Mr. Chairman, I support the concept of a tax credit for persons paying tuition for education as a means of reducing the cost of education for the student and as a means to encourage educational improvement.

As a cosponsor of legislation to accomplish this goal, I commend my colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee for bringing this legislation to the House floor and for providing the mechanism by which an amendment can be offered to extend the availability of the tax credit to those paying elementary and secondary tuition expenses.

Some see this as an education issue; but, in my judgment, it is a question of tax policy. Traditionally, the Congress has used its taxing powers to effect desired social change. The legislation before us is a logical extension of this authority and this tradition. It is directed toward providing a measure of tax relief and equity for our overburdened middle-income taxpayers.

As one who was educated in the public school system and been associated closely with organizations related to the public educational system, I strongly support and will continue to defend the best possible public school system and would not support any proposal directed at weakening it.

The tuition tax credit would not reduce the budget allocation to our public schools but would, instead, simply provide a diversity of educational opportunity. Innovation and experimentation have been helpful in advancing the quality of our educational institutions and benefit both the private and the public school systems, and the public in general. Many educators have mentioned to me that the competition factor that private schools provide is a healthy one for our society and our educational system. Fewer than 10 percent of all elementary and secondary students are enrolled in private schools, and with annual expenditures for public education at about $100 billion, the budget estimate of $900 million approved by the House last week and expenditure of which is authorized in this legislation is not very significant by comparison and certainly this cannot be construed to be a threat to our public school systems.

Simple equity and fairness lead to the conclusion that there is room in this great Republic for a strong and viable public school system while, at the same time, retaining the many contributions private schools provide to our society.

The tuition tax credit would provide for much needed tax relief for middle- and lower-income families. The concept is intended to permit parents, who are increasingly burdened by the escalating costs of education for their children, to take a credit on their income tax returns for legitimate educational expenses.

With regard to the constitutional issues being raised, testimony, and expert comment from constitutional scholars has overwhelmingly endorsed the tax credit idea. Nevertheless, I recognize that any conclusions are debatable and will be ultimately resolved by the courts.

It is significant to note in debating the question of constitutionality that the tax relief proposed by this legislation is being offered to the individual and not the institution. If there were to be direct institutional aid to a church-related or private school, this in my view would be unconstitutional and, accordingly, I would oppose it.

The concept of direct assistance to the individual is certainly not a new idea. It has been used successfully in the administration of the GI educational benefits bill among others. In addition, donations to churches and charitable oganizations are deductible under the existing tax code, so the comparable legal and constitutional questions have been addressed.

Last, the tuition tax credit will be a simple proposal to administer. One which will not add another layer to the bureaucracy or add additional administrative costs to our already overly swollen Federal budget.

I urge my colleagues to support the inclusion of elementary and secondary educational tuition expenses. This group of students comprise only approximately one-fifth to one-fourth of the total potential beneficiaries and less of the potential revenue loss.

Finally, this legislation provides for a speedy judicial test of the constitutionality. Many legal scholars believe such a test will result in the Court's approval. I, for one, believe we should settle this constitutional challenge once and for all so as to remove the continuing aura of ambiguity on this issue. Regardless of the so-called constitutional experts, however, it is the constitutional responsibility of the Congress to enact measures which it has reasonable grounds to believe are constitutional and to leave the final decision to the Supreme Court.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CORCORAN.

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, during the months that I have been privileged to serve in this House, I have on many occasions taken the floor to argue the case and urge support for tuition tax credits.

Today should be a grand day because we are finally getting to tax credits in a form that really counts. After all, the bill before us has been brought to the floor by the Ways and Means Committee, heretofore the place where tuition tax credits have been pigeon-holed. Yes, it should be a grand day for tuition tax credits because most everyone agrees that the bill will pass this House, at least with those provisions reported favorably by the Ways and Means Committee.

So, why on Earth you may wonder, am I sounding apprehensive? Indeed, some might say it is rather incongruous for the original House sponsor of the so-called Roth college tax credit bill to be injecting a note of pessimism into this debate. Well, Mr. Chairman, let me tell you what I have found in preparation for this debate.

First, let us put this in some perspective:

During the past few years, the other body has repeatedly passed college tax credit bills, and the House has killed them. Last December, the social security bill was held hostage by the tax credit amendment of the other body until an agreement was made that the Ways and Means Committee would take up the tax credit issue in 1978. That committee did so and the product of its work is before us today.

In the meantime, the Carter administration began to move on this, sparked by a memorandum from HEW Secretary Califano to the President urging that this hot issue be corralled. After getting the go-ahead from the President, Mr. Califano's people in HEW went to work and devised a fairly predictable solution—solve the problem by extending the existing Federal grant and loan programs to cover middle-income families.

This proposal was introduced, and on March 8 it was quickly approved by the House Education and Labor Committee as H.R. 11274, the so-called Middle-Income Student Assistance Act. Similar action was taken at about the same time in the other body.

Then, on March 20 an attempt was made by the leadership of this House and the sponsors of H.R. 11274 to bypass the Rules Committee and the tax credit sponsors and consider it on the Suspension Calendar for that day. By a vote of 156 to 218, this House refused to be taken in by this unfair maneuver, which would have forced consideration of the administration's proposal without adequate debate or the opportunity to amend it.

Since then, the administration's proposal has been marking time in the Rules Committee, presumably awaiting action by the Ways and Means Committee on tax credits. That action has occurred, bringing us to the debate on the tax credit bill today.

But what has actually been happening on the alternative to tax credits offered by the administration? Well, they certainly have not been marking time.

First, the President's men and women went to the House Budget Committee and got the majority there to produce a committee report, which in several instances is very antagonistic to tax credits and very supportive of the alternative offered by the Carter administration. During floor debate, many Members, including me, challenged this highly unusual action by the Budget Committee taking a choice between these two different solutions before either of the authorizing committees had completed action. And the result of our work on the House floor was to check the action of the Budget Committee and the President's representatives, thus repairing most of the damage done to our orderly legislative processes.

But, Mr. Chairman, the intrigue has by no means ended. Next, we must follow this controversy to the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Labor and HEW, where again an attempt is being made to "jimmy the works" against tax credits.

It appears that, having failed to accomplish their ends with the Budget Committee, our opponents are now working behind closed doors in the Appropriations Committee. Apparently, they are trying to get most of the funding needed for the Carter program without going through the "inconvenience" of floor action; thereby bypassing the necessity of full and open debate by the entire House membership on H.R. 11274, the so-called Middle-Income Assistance Act.

Mr. Chairman, I recognize this is a serious charge on my part, but considering the way this issue has been handled by the Carter administration ever since the controversy over tax credits began, and the evidence uncovered regarding the Appropriations Committee, I fear this conclusion is inescapable.

Mr. Chairman, let me close with two points. First, it is obvious to me that the action we take on tax credits today is really only one big step in the process. Now we are on offense, and I am confident we are going to make some big points for tuition tax credits.

But, secondly, we are going to have to get tough on defense to win this battle over tuition tax credits. We played good defense during the debate on the budget resolution, but more defense may be called for when we get to the HEW appropriation bill. For that reason, I sent Chairman GEORGE MAHON of the Appropriations Committee a letter on May 23, alerting him to the shenanigans taking place in the Labor-HEW Subcommittee, and I would like to share that letter with my colleagues for their information at this point in the RECORD:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., May 23, 1978.

HON. GEORGE H. MAHON,
Chairman, House Committee on Appropriations, Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CHAIRMAN MAHON: It has recently been brought to my attention that the Labor-HEW Subcommittee of the full House Appropriations Committee on May 4, reported out some controversial funding recommendations for fiscal year 1979. The provisions in the bill which especially disturb me center around the increased appropriations proposed for the Basic Education Opportunity Grant Program, the Supplementary Education Opportunity Grant Program, the Work Study Program, and the Incentive Grant Program for State Scholars.

It is apparent to me that these increased appropriations, amounting to nearly $1.4 billion, were recommended as a vehicle to circumvent the present legislative process now before the House. As you are aware, the House will consider H.R. 12050, the "Tuition Tax Credit Act of 1978," later this week. Since early this year, that proposal has been a competing force against the so-called "Middle-Income Student Assistance Act." Although the President and the majority leadership in Congress favor the latter approach, there is widespread support for the tax credit concept among the membership in the House as witnessed during the consideration of the second budget resolution for fiscal year 1978, last September, and the first budget resolution for fiscal year 1979, recently enacted.

On March 20, 1978, the full House went on record in opposing the President's higher education plan by a resounding vote of 218–156. Although this vote occurred on a technical motion, it was apparent that the membership will continue to refuse to consider that proposal without also, at the same time, being able to pass judgment on the tax credit approach. It seems to me now that an end run has occurred within the subcommittee to force the President's program through, perhaps thinking that it would never be successfully adopted on the House floor. Their thinking, perhaps, is that if the tax credit bill passes Congress, then it could go to the President, and he could veto it with the knowledge that funding for most of his program is contained in this year's Labor-HEW appropriations bill!

Mr. Chairman, I would ask that when this bill is considered by the full Appropriations Committee on June 1, that you take into account the unfairness of this situation. This is not the open approach to choosing between competing governmental solutions that the American people expect from their government. We should allow enough time for the House and the Senate to work their wills on this critical issue. Because of the widespread attention and support the tax credit concept has in this country, I hope you will agree it would be unfair and wrong to allow this procedure to occur. Furthermore, I might point out this additional appropriation is nearly $700 million more than is contained in the 1979 budget resolution, thus its passage would be a severe jolt to the entire budget process.

I would appreciate your personal attention to this important matter. Please feel free to contact me if I can be of further assistance to you.

Sincerely,

TOM CORCORAN,
Representative in Congress,
15th District, Illinois.

Mr. Chairman, those who have preceded me in this debate have demonstrated that the better solution for helping middle-income families educate their children is the tuition tax credit. We do not need more bureaucracy to solve this problem. Letting people keep their own money and make their own choice is not only the better way; it is the American way.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. QUIE).

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Chairman, I introduced the Middle-Income Student Assistance Act that was recommended by President Carter. In the Committee on Education and Labor we adopted an amendment offered by myself which gives a more even reduction in the amount of BEOG grant a student is entitled based on parents' income up to $26,700. The Carter proposal gave a flat grant of $250 for all with incomes between $16,000 and $25,000. I think it is an excellent piece of legislation now. When it comes before this body I will be urging strongly that we do adopt it.

However, I am one of those who favors tax credits. I have for years. In fact, all of the years I have been in Congress, I have favored tax credits. I believe it should not in any way be confused with what we are trying to do in the Middle-Income Student Assistance Act, because there is no grant of money as such in the tax credits. To me it is very similar to tax deductions.

What we are saying is, in effect, we should not tax people for the money that they expend where, if they did not, the public would pay for it. Normally that comes about with a tax deduction, but I find a tax credit a much fairer piece of legislation, even though very similar to the tax deduction, in that no matter at what income level a person is, the benefit will be the same in the amount of taxes each will not have to pay. So that is just letting money remain with the taxpayer for expenditures that he makes.

One of the strongest reasons why I support tax credits for higher education is that it will encourage motivation on the part of parents while the students are in high school, or even before, because one thing they are certain of, no matter what income they will have at the time their son or daughter goes to college, they will be able to receive a tax credit. As far as the grants are concerned, it is only for those who are at lower income, and they do not know what their income will be when their students go to college. Their hope would be that they would be at higher income at that time.

Motivation will encourage more people to go on to postsecondary education, and I think our country benefits by postsecondary education.

I also support tax credits for elementary and secondary schools. As was talked about earlier, I had considered offering an amendment that there would be a limit on the amount of tax credit for elementary and secondary education. The limit I would propose is the average amount of Federal aid which is made available per public elementary and secondary student in our country. However, since the Vanik amendment only has $100 tax credit in the second and third year, we will not get up to the amount that is made available for public education anyway. So there is no reason to even work on such a limit at this time.

I believe also that this will not in any way endanger public education, as public educators say. I think it will only strengthen education. The amount of $100 tax credit is not going to encourage a vast expansion of private schools in the Nation. The cost is much greater than $100, closer to $2,500. Tax audits will only be a recognition of the sacrifice that some parents are making in order that they might have the education they want for their children.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SAWYER).

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take the full 3 minutes. I just want to respond to the arguments advanced by my distinguished colleague. the gentleman from California (Mr. KETCHUM).

I am fully in support of the two Vanik-Frenzel amendments, as well as the bill. In my district there is the city of Grand Rapids, Mich., where 30 percent of the students attend parochial school systems. We have a large Christian Reformed system as well as a Catholic system. Now, if those systems were abolished, it would be reasonable to assume that the expense to the public school system, and hence to the taxpayers, would be increased by substantially the same percentage; so the argument that it is inequitable to those that have neither children or are married or retired fails, because the tax burden would be substantially increased were it not for the taking on of a significant portion of this burden by those who opt to support the private school system.

Mr. KETCHUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAWYER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KETCHUM. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask two questions of the gentleman from Michigan. The gentleman mentioned parochial schools. Are there public schools there as well?

Mr. SAWYER. Yes; certainly there would be a lot more public schools if it were not for the parochial schools.

Mr. KETCHUM. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, if they do have public schools, there is nothing in this bill to close the public schools.

The second question I have to ask, Is there anything in the law in the gentleman's district that forces people to send their children to private schools?

Mr. SAWYER. No; but I make the argument back, that if the private school system was not being supported by parents who opt to use the private school system, the tax burden on the people in Grand Rapids would increase by 25 to 30 percent; so there is no inequity in this situation giving these people the option to send their children to private schools and still take on the public load that they opt to take and thus spare the public that additional expense.

Mr. KETCHUM. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I appreciate the argument that if the children from the private schools would invade the public schools, there would be an increase in expense to the taxpayers; but the children going to private schools do so entirely freely by their own choice.

Mr. SAWYER. Well, I do not see the validity of an argument that there is an inequity to allow those parents who send their children to private schools some credit for the additional burden they remove from other taxpayers.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho (Mr. SYMMS).

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to express my support for the tuition tax credit concept. I am a cosponsor of H.R. 10974 with our colleague, Congressman DELANEY. Our bill allows the tax credits for primary and secondary education as well as postsecondary tuition; thus, I will be supporting the Frenzel-Vanik amendment to the committee bill.

This legislation, Mr. Chairman, represents a fresh alternative to the usual approach taken by Congress in such matters. Let us compare for a moment the tax credit approach with the Carter plan for increased Federal grants to college students. Carter has proposed an additional $1.5 billion to assist low- and middle-income families in meeting the costs of college education to be channeled through direct grants to families with proven need up to a maximum of $250 a year. Now the bill under consideration today will also provide $250 per year in the form of a tax credit to any taxpayer who certified that he was paying tuition for a dependent. Our approach here would require no more than one line on a 1040 form, with a supporting affidavit.

However, the Carter plan would require use of the immense Federal bureaucracy with the usual forms, reviews, disclosures, judgments, paperwork, and prolonged correspondence. Under this approach the Government retains all the power, and the people must appeal to the Government like supplicants.

What is most interesting to me, Mr. Chairman, is the opposition to the tax credit approach by the special interest education-welfare lobby and by the Federal bureaucracy itself.

Initially, it was argued that the tax credit approach such as that advocated by Senator ROTH was too expensive. But, this has proven to be a little ridiculous; the estimated cost of the tax credit approach and the Carter administration's grant plan are about the same $1.5 billion. The only difference is that many more families would benefit from the tax credit approach.

This takes us to the real objections to this legislation. We are being told that tuition tax credits would benefit the well to do far more than those who need help. But a careful analysis would, I think, refute this. Does anyone seriously believe that a $250 or even a $500 a year tax credit is going to make a difference in whether or not a family can send a student to Harvard or Stanford? Certainly not. But, a $250 to $500 tax credit might enable a lower middle-income family to send a student to a State university such as the University of Idaho or Boise State University. So I think that tuition tax credits will benefit most those who need help—the lower- and middle-income families.

There are also the assertions that this legislation will lead to the destruction of public schools. Well, if the public education establishment is so fearful of this bill then that ought to tell us something. Nevertheless, I think that assertion is wrong also. Fortunately, one organization, the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), has attempted to refute this claim. I would like to include their statement that was sent to all Members of the House in my remarks at this time:

AN OPEN LETTER TO MEMBERS OF CONGRESS ON THE TUITION TAX CREDIT ISSUE

The Congress of Racial Equality urges you to support tuition tax credits for elementary and secondary school students. CORE, as a major national civil-rights organization, rooted in Black communities across the nation, is in a unique and important position to speak on this legislation, particularly in terms of its effects on Black and other minority citizens. It is our longstanding concern for the education of our youth which has brought us to the Senate Finance and House Ways and Means Committee hearings and which impels us to address you now, as key votes on the legislation approach.

During the debate on tuition tax credits, various allegations have been made that the credits would destroy public schools and that minorities, in particular, would be hurt. We believe not only that such fears are groundless but that tuition tax credits will benefit the poor and minorities. A look at the hard facts and common-sense reasoning will show why this is so.

The rich have always had choice in America. Their children either attend private schools or, much more typically, they attend exclusive suburban public schools. Tuition tax credits are one effective way of increasing the choices available to poor people.

CORE has long been committed to the improvement of public schools, and CORE is unchanged in its dedication to this goal. However, the public schools are now doing an inadequate job of educating inner-city Black children. CORE, in response to vigorous urging from the community, opened CORE Community School in the South Bronx. In surveying the situation, we found that in the neighborhood public schools the children were reading, on the average, one to two years behind grade level, with many individual cases of failure much worse than that. In New York City the proportion of pupils reading at or above grade level has dropped from 47 percent to 40 percent in the past two years. The same dismal situation prevails in cities across the country. Public schools are enmeshed in webs of bureaucracy; while administrators' and teachers union interests are deemed important, the children's interests are largely neglected.

The people are crying out for alternatives. We have seen this at our school in the Bronx. We have seen this as parents in poor communities across the country do without groceries so they can scrape up the tuition to send their children to non-public schools. Incidentally, the tuition at these neighborhood non-public schools (which are much more numerous than the elite private schools often cited in discussions) is usually at a low enough level that the amount of the proposed tax credit would be significant.

These families we speak of should no longer have to face financial hardship to obtain quality education.

The lack of financially plausible non-public school options has contributed to the exodus from cities and the destabilization of neighborhoods. A vote for tuition tax credits would be a vote for strengthening communities and recognizing their right to control their own institutions.

Perhaps the most salient point is that the existence of strong non-public schools, fostered by tuition tax credits, will provide a competitive stimulus for improvement in the public schools. No one expects people to desert public schools in droves upon enactment of tax credits, and CORE, being strongly committed to improvement of public schools, would not wish for such an eventuality. Rather, private schools will be a catalyst for change. Competition is the only real hope for breaking the bureaucratic logjam now gripping our public schools and increasing accountability and effectiveness.

In the course of the debate you have heard school boards, teachers unions and others with vested interests decry tuition tax credits and claim that public schools will be destroyed. Their rhetoric reflects only their own fear of losing power and their embarrassment over the failure of too many of the public schools entrusted to their care. We note that, by and large the affluent have not abandoned public in favor of private schools. Rather, they have voted with their feet and moved to suburban areas with exclusive public schools, where per-pupil expenditures are two to three times as much as at the most elite prep schools.

Some civil-rights leaders have spoken in opposition to tuition tax credits. This reflects largely that the tax credit approach to tuition assistance is rather new in terms of minority community participation, and the possible benefits of this approach have been inadequately explored. Also, some minority leaders are allied with school board and union powers that be and are putting their trust in the same old non-functional formulae. But we have seen the groundswell of opinion in the Black community at large in favor of alternatives.

In regard to specific features of tuition tax credit legislation the existence of a refundability clause, which would allow a refund to the taxpayer if the tuition tax credit is greater than the total tax owed, would be highly beneficial to the poor and minorities. They could benefit the most from this provision, because of their low tax bracket.

In summary, every day tuition tax credits are not available is a day when more poor and minority children are stifled in our failing public school systems. A choice is needed now. CORE has been in a position to perform an objective clear-headed analysis of the tuition tax credit issue. We trust that you will perform such rigorous analysis and hope that you will see the value of tuition tax credits.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I think that it is imperative that we consider the real reason that special interest groups such as the National Education Association, the Ralph Nader groups, and the Federal bureaucracy are so strongly opposing these tax credits.

The one big difference in this legislation that we are considering today from most other bills that flow through Congress is that this bill does not redistribute income from those who earn it to those who do not. The chief opponents to this bill such as the NEA and Ralph Nader and the socioeconomic manipulators in the public sector are dedicated to forced income redistribution by Government through the progressive tax system. Furthermore, I would suggest that Government bureaucrats and their special interest allies have a natural dislike for what they cannot control. In this case freedom of choice in education. I ask why does HEW and the NEA object so strongly to free choice in education on the part of parents and students?

Mr. Chairman, I strongly urge this House to pass this legislation.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA).

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, to be effective a higher education policy ought to provide help to parents in real situations. The bill that we are debating today involves $100 of help this year, $150 of help next year, and a maximum of $250 of help.

I must confess that I am constrained to agree with my colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BURKE) when he asks the question: "What are we arguing about?" This certainly is not enough to make a difference in terms of parents being able to afford higher education for their children. In fact, it does not even provide much of a rooting interest in their problem. Yet even if we go up to the munificent sum of $500, which is what the Senate bill provides, we are not providing enough help and we are talking about a revenue impact of several billions of dollars.

The hard facts are that a tax credit or a forgiveness of tax is not going to solve the real problems that parents with children in higher education institutions have, and that is that they have a cash shortage. They do not so much need a "tag day" or a handout as much as they need something to smooth over what is a very rough financial period for them over a relatively short period of time.

That is why the gentleman from California (Mr. KETCHUM) and I are proposing an amendment which will provide substantial help of up to $2,000 a year for each child in higher education. And our proposal will mean less of a revenue impact to the Treasury.

We are not doing this with mirrors or with peanut shells; we are doing it simply in this way: Instead of a forgiveness of taxes, our proposal is a deferral of taxes or a loan, if you will, against taxes—to be repaid over a 10-year period after the student is out of college, with a 3-percent interest charge.

So instead of having this heavy revenue impact that the existing proposal portends, the Mikva-Ketchum proposal will cost much less, and by 1989, it will in fact be bringing in some modest sums to the Treasury; and instead of providing $100 this year, our proposal will provide $1,000 of tax deferral this year.

For those reasons, we think that the amendment which I intend to offer, which is made in order under the rule as a substitute and which lost in the Committee on Ways and Means by a vote of 19 to 18, ought to be adopted. It will in fact provide real relief to parents, and it will mean a far less impact to the Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, let me address myself, if I may, for one moment to one of the other amendments that will be offered. That is the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) and the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) to include elementary and secondary education in this proposal. Another prerequisite for any kind of effective measure that we adopt here is that it has to become law.

Mr. Chairman, I am aware that there are a lot of our colleagues who believe that the Constitution is not something we ought to busy ourselves about and that we ought to leave that to the Supreme Court. But I would suggest to them that, if for no other reason, they should view the problem pragmatically and be aware that the present Attorney General, at the request of the administration, has specifically ruled that an amendment like the Vanik-Frenzel proposal is unconstitutional.

I put the question to the Members on solely pragmatic terms, if they agree with the opinion or not: Is there any stretch of the imagination by which the President of the United States can sign a bill which his own Attorney General has told him is unconstitutional?

The surest way of making certain that there is no bill that ever becomes law is to include in it elementary and secondary education. If the idea of tuition tax credits or tuition deferral is a good idea, we ought to limit that to higher education, where there is a good chance that it is constitutional and where the Attorney General has indicated that he will impose no constitutional opposition. Otherwise, we are inviting a fruitless exercise in sending a bill to the President, knowing that he must veto the bill.

Mr. Chairman, let me say, briefly, so far as the merits on constitutionality is concerned, for those of us who view the oath we took on the opening day to support and defend the Constitution of the United States as the same oath that is taken by the Supreme Court of the United States, the cases are quite clear; this kind of proposal would run afoul of the establishment clause of the first amendment, so far as church and state is concerned.

If I can quote one brief paragraph from the Nyquist decision, which has been referred to previously, Justice Powell, now still sitting on the court, said for the majority:

> . . . Special tax benefits, however, cannot be squared with the principles of neutrality established by the decisions of this Court. To the contrary, insofar as such benefits render assistance to parents who send their children to sectarian schools, their purpose and inevitable effect are to aid and advance those religious institutions.

The bill was struck down as a result.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ERLENBORN).

Mr. ERLENBORN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 12050. I would like to address my comments to the basic bill providing tax benefits for the support of the cost of higher education, postsecondary education, as it is called.

Earlier this year, the administration, seeing the support that evidently was building for the proposition of tuition tax credits, came up with their own version of help for postsecondary education. That bill went to our Committee on Education and Labor. That bill would change the family income limits for participation in the currently existing programs—the basic educational opportunity grant, the supplemental education opportunity grant, and the guaranteed student loan program.

One thing that the administration pointed out, in support of that, was that these programs would help the entire range of families, from the very lowest income to the upper limits, as they were proposed by the administration. Therefore, that was fair, as opposed to tuition tax credits, which the administration said would help only middle and upper income people.

First of all, I think the administration was analyzing this incorrectly by looking at tuition tax credits all alone, as though it would be the only existing program, and testing that against the range of those who might need help to determine whether this one program, standing alone, was fair for all income levels. And if you do that, of course, if you set the parameters of your examination in that way, you have already answered the question before you need to examine the program, because the parameters themselves exclude fairness.

What we should do is look at the total system, the BEOG's and SEOG's guaranteed student loan program and tuition tax credit standing together as the range of programs available and as the range of programs that do introduce more fairness into the system than the one proposed by the administration or that existing today.

Mr. Chairman, the Members may recall that when the administration program came on the floor under suspension of the rules, I asked that we have a recorded vote on the question of ordering a second; and by a substantial margin, this body turned down ordering the second. Therefore, we did not consider the administration's program. This body had made it clear it preferred the bill before us today.

One other thing I would like to mention is that the Congress of Racial Equality endorsed the bill before us with the addition of primary and secondary. I found this to be a very interesting document of support which came to my desk the other day, in which they pointed out that diversity in primary and secondary education is very important and that the way to keep private schools in operation and, therefore, provide the diversity and some competition at the primary and secondary level was to encourage, through tuition tax credits, helping those primary and secondary schools.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. EILBERG).

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the bill and of the Vanik amendments.

Mr. Chairman, before the House votes on the amendment to include nonpublic elementary and secondary schools in the tuition tax credit bill, I would like to take this opportunity to tell my colleagues what this legislation means to the city of Philadelphia.

More than 30 percent of the children in Philadelphia attend nonpublic elementary and secondary schools. In fact, of all major American cities, Philadelphia has the second largest percentage of students in nonpublic schools.

The children that attend these schools are not the sons and daughters of rich parents who wish to avoid public schools. Quite the contrary, the children come primarily from lower and middle income families. Many of the students are not Catholic.

The point, Mr. Chairman, is that the nonpublic elementary and secondary schools of Philadelphia are not exclusive institutions.

The student body of these schools is made up of children whose parents have a commitment to excellence in education. In a great many instances, families undergo severe financial hardships in order to make it possible for the children to attend nonpublic schools.

In the past few years, tuition at these schools has increased significantly. Parents who—through sacrifice—were able to send their children to nonpublic schools, are being priced out of the market. Their freedom to choose the kind of education they wish for their children is being abridged by a lack of available funds.

In Philadelphia, the maintenance of nonpublic schools is absolutely essential. The public schools are already overburdened, and the system faces serious financial problems. If a large number of children who now attend nonpublic schools were suddenly put into the public school system, the public schools of Philadelphia would face a crisis. An influx of new students into the public schools would be a fiscal and educational disaster. Therefore, the health of the public schools in Philadelphia depends on the continued vitality of the nonpublic schools system.

Mr. Chairman, I favor tuition tax credits for parents who send their children to nonpublic elementary and secondary schools, because I am committed to the continued success of both the public and nonpublic educational systems in Philadelphia.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Kansas (Ms. KEYS).

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Ms. KEYS. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

My friends on the other side have been making glowing references to an organization called "CORE."

I wonder whether any of them have researched in recent years what CORE is all about. It is not one of the major civil rights organizations. It has almost been moribund for about 5 or 6 years, so I think my unenlightened friends on that side of the aisle ought to delete any references to CORE because they do not know enough about it.

Ms. KEYS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the tuition tax credit legislation before us. While I believe there is a need for increased assistance to college students and their families to cover the rising cost of tuition, I do not believe that the tuition tax credit is the most effective means of providing that aid. The credit is inefficiently distributed, fails to provide middle class families with the level of assistance they need at the time they need it, increases taxpayer paperwork, and fragments our national educational policy.

The bill provides a maximum credit of $250 to families regardless of their income level. Thus, all families with children in school would receive the credit regardless of their financial ability to bear the cost of their children's education. A major portion of the benefits will go to families in upper income brackets. Nearly one-third of the benefits of the bill will go to families with earnings in excess of $30,000 annually.

With college costs running at $7,000 a year, many middle-income families do need assistance in providing for their children's education. In the face of such enormous outlays, the proposed credit is of negligible assistance. The $896 million in the bill could be more wisely spent in offering low interest loans to the same families.

Under the proposed HEW student aid program a college student in a hypothetical family earning $25,000 a year would receive about $1,600 more from direct aid than from the tuition tax credit. In a $40,000 a year family, a student could be expected to receive as much as $2,500 more in direct aid. Clearly, the $250 credit is not the most efficient expenditure of taxpayer funds nor the most helpful to families.

More importantly, the assistance provided by the credit does not come at the time when the student needs it the most. Tax years do not coincide with school years, and families must find means of paying tuition bills in September—long before tax time arrives.

Further, the tax credit significantly increases the complexity of the tax system and the paperwork burden on taxpayers. Because the credit must be offset by the amount of any tax-free scholarships or other assistance such as veteran's benefits, taxpayers must pro rate the award between tuition and other expenses. One can anticipate a new Form TTC (Tuition Tax Credit) which requires complex recordkeeping and a series of lengthy calculations for the taxpayer as well as additional IRS audit capacity.

The institution of a tax credit fragments our national educational policy. Our educational leaders have long attempted to foster educational goals which equalize educational opportunity and which take reasonable account of the needs of our entire system. The tuition tax credit is clearly a step backward in achieving those goals.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that it has to be considered as tax legislation. It is easy to fall into the category of thinking that we are passing education legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I remind the Members that it is tax legislation. As such, I would suggest it is a cruel hoax. It is not new legislation or changes in tax laws which bring fairness or equity into those laws. It falls and fails on both counts.

Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that the promise of bringing tax relief to citizens of this country is especially a cruel hoax, as we have already seen unexpected increases in tuition in higher education and postsecondary institutions at even the suggestion that this bill might be passed.

Mr. Chairman, I would also like to remind the Members that the idea of providing tax relief for elementary and secondary education, should the Vanik amendment pass, it is, indeed, a cruel hoax. As a matter of fact, parochial schools have made it very clear that their intention would be to immediately increase their tuition if this legislation would become law or established education policy.

I would remind the Members of the testimony that educators and student groups, unanimously came in to me and suggested that this would not be the way to continue assistance to educational opportunity.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield on that point.

Ms. KEYS. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, that testimony was not unanimous.

Ms. KEYS. Mr. Chairman, I would accept the gentleman's statement.

The statements before our committee were not unanimous, but the people who sat in my office were unanimous.

Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that we should put our tax dollars where they count for educational policy, and that is in increasing student loans, grants and scholarships in existing programs to students who qualify on need and merit.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL).

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, this issue of tuition tax credits for education is highly controversial—not so much for higher education as extending the principle to the primary and secondary level.

I have for many years supported the concept for higher education and while at one time it could have been considered to be self-serving—as we sent four children to private institutions of higher learning—it comes too late for my wife and I to benefit in any way.

The education of our four children has turned out to be our largest dollar investment. It has been going on now for 10 years and will continue for another so I do not need anyone to tell me what the costs are. It is just getting to be an unbearable burden for the lower- and middle-income parents of this country.

TUITION TAX CREDITS

Mr. Chairman, when it comes to supporting important legislation, each of us eventually becomes either a preacher or one who has been convinced.

There are some issues about which we are so knowledgeable and so certain that we are immediately ready to preach their virtue to all who will listen.

On the other hand, many of us become slowly convinced about the virtue of certain positions and programs. Initially skeptical, perhaps even antagonistic, we read and study as much as we can. Quite often our original skepticism is overcome by the sheer weight of solid argument and documented fact. We become converted to a point of view we originally either doubted or actively disliked.

On the issue of tuition tax credits, I must say I am among those who have been convinced. When this idea started to become talked about, I doubted its wisdom. I had some real problems with what I sincerely believed were constitutional issues involved, as well as economic questions.

The idea of tuition tax credits makes educational sense. Tax credits, in the long run, make economic sense as well. Finally, tax tuition credits give the American people more freedom of choice. I believe it is precisely the exercise of such freedom that is most lacking in our educational system today.

Yes, I have heard and read the arguments against these credits. They are sincere arguments. But sincere as they may be, they are not persuasive.

One of the major arguments against tuition tax credits is that they will destroy the public schools.

This is a grave charge and since it has been made bv educational leaders, I looked into the change as best I could to determine whether or not there was any evidence to back up this claim.

The first thing I found was that there is absolutely no evidence available at present to even suggest that thriving private schools are a threat to public schols. Indeed, quite the opposite is the case.

Those States which spend the most per capita for public education are also those with the largest percentage of students in nonpublic schools. Deplorably, the reverse is true: those States which spend the least per capita on public education are those with the smallest numbers of nonpublic school pupils. The relationship, in my view, is due to the fact that competition between public and private institutions is beneficial to both systems. It appears that the greater the parental involvement in matters of educational choice, the greater the public esteem and support for all education.

That is what Walter E. Williams, distinguished economist of Temple University says about the charge that tuition tax credits would destroy the public schools:

. . . many, many public schools are doing an excellent job of educating America's youth. These are schools which satisfy parents and would not be threatened by increased competition The schools that would be threatened by the reduction of monopoly powers are those public schools failing to do a job at least as good as their nearby competitors. These schools, for the most part, are those in inner cities that produce a product grossly inferior to their non-public counterparts. If such schools go out of business (become unattended), such an outcome is consistent with market efficiency and enhanced social welfare; the inefficient producers are weeded out and replaced by efficient producers.

I might add that those words come from a black American educator whose concern over the future of inner-city children is well known.

I fully recognize that personal experience cannot substitute for detailed analysis in a complex area such as this. But I do think it is relevant to my own position that I attended public elementary and high schools as did my wife and our four children. I am hardly what one would call a dissatisfied parent or taxpayer—insofar as public school education is concerned. Far from being opposed to a strong public school system I want to do everything in my power to make certain the public school systems throughout America function as well as the one we have back in Peoria.

At the same time, however, I know that there are some public schools which have, quite simply, failed. A recent series in the Washington Post outlined the appalling educational problems in the public schools of Washington, D.C. We all have read the headlines about declining test scores. We all have heard about or perhaps even experienced in our own schools, violence, lack of student interest, a general decline of educational standards. We cannot wish these things away and we cannot say to parents that they must send their children to schools thus afflicted. No, we should provide some mechanism for freedom of choice. Tax credits is such a mechanism, and it will not destroy public education.

I would like to turn now to what is perhaps the most complex and most emotional aspect of the tax credit issue—extending the principle to the primary and secondary level and whether that runs afoul of the Constitution.

I can say that I thought longer and harder over this proposition than any other, because of the principle involved.

While I respect the sincere feelings of many of my friends and colleagues who do not agree with me, I am personally convinced that the church-State issue does not apply in this case. I believe the tax credit is constitutional. And I believe it is the duty of the Congress to send a good, responsible bill to the President and, if it reaches the Supreme Court, so be it.

We should not be deterred in our deliberations because some so-called experts maintain that a tax credit is "clearly unconstitutional," as I read the other day. Clearly? To whom? Not to other experts who tell us just as convincingly and with as much, if not more, documentation, that it is constitutional.

Let us not be paralyzed by indecision because experts disagree. Let us do our duty as we see fit and let the issue get to the Supreme Court. If we are going to let warnings of unconstitutionality stop the legislative process, we may as well close shop and let the lawyers run the Congress, especially when there are as many experts saying tax credits are constitutional as there are saying it is not.

Columnist George Will recently addressed his column to this question and his words are deserving of mention here. He said:

Thirty years ago the Supreme Court, ignoring the clear intent of the "establishment" clause, propounded an extreme doctrine: no law can "aid one religion, aid all religions, or prefer one religion over another." That doctrine would have the virtue of simplicity, were simplicity a virtue in constitutional law. It is not, and the doctrine is wrong.

Edwin S. Corwin, the constitutional scholar, wrote: "The historical record shows beyond peradventure that the core idea of 'an establishment of religion' comprises the idea of preference; and that any act of public authority favorable to religion in general cannot, without manifest falsification of history, be brought under the ban of that phrase."

Previous Court decisions relating to tuition tax credits dealt with State laws that were in many regards suspect because of the narrowness of their application, the restrictions upon student eligibility, and the fact that they were limited exclusively to elementary and secondary school pupils. In fact, that was the incorrect hypothesis which Secretary Califano presented to Attorney General Bell and which led to Mr. Bell's negative evaluation of tuition tax credit legislation. As long as the Congress permits taxpayers deductions for donations to churches for specifically religious purposes, the constitutional arguments against tuition tax credits are not likely to be effective.

I recognize that there is one more major objection raised against the tuition tax credit and that is its cost.

Admittedly the cost will be somewhere close to $5 billion by calendar year 1980, but that $5 billion figure represents only 1 percent of the entire Carter administration budget. It is only 4 percent of what the Nation's taxpayers currently spend every year for education on the Federal, State, and local levels. If the current trend of increasing costs and decreasing enrollment in private education persists more and more children now attending private schools will be enrolling in public schools.

Let us suppose that half of the current 7.7 million private school students were to enroll in the public schools during the next 5 years. Suppose all of them did. What do you think that would cost the taxpayer given the current per-pupil expenditures in public schools?

And while we are discussing the problem of "tax loss," let us get something straight. The money an American earns is his, not the Government's. I cannot seem to fathom this new philosophy which holds that if the Government graciously allows you to keep some of the money you earn, it is doing you some kind of a favor. I have even heard it said that a tax credit is the same as a "cash grant"—that is just so much baloney.

The primary responsibility to educate children rests with parents, not with the State. When the State makes it economically difficult for parents to educate their children as they see fit, then Federal policy, not the parents, must do some rethinking. This is what tax credits are all about.

There are also fears that the tuition tax credit will result in more segregated schools. I do not believe this to be the case. Suffice it to say that when two distinguished black professors like Thomas Sowell and Walter Williams have testified before Congress that black children will be helped, not hurt, by a tax credit, I am persuaded that the "segregation" argument has no merit.

At the heart of this issue is not tax dollars or constitutional questions or even educational ones. At the heart of this issue is freedom. Out of freedom grows diversity and out of diversity comes opportunities for growth and change. I do not see this as an issue between public-nonpublic education. I see it as an issue concerning American parents and their children. They alone should decide what is best where education is concerned. The tuition tax credit is not a perfect instrument, but it does offer parents all across America a chance to choose. These parents are not going to suddenly drag their children out of public schools just to get a tax credit, contrary to what we are told by hysterical opponents of this measure.

Parents love their children. They want to do what is best for them. That is what matters here and that is why I support the concept of tuition tax credits for parents paying tuition to college, secondary, and elementary schools.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. FORD), a member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. FORD of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in opposition to H.R. 12050, the Tuition Tax Credit Act of 1978. First of all, Mr. Chairman, the whole concept of a tuition tax credit is an inefficient way of directing aid to students and their families who are in need. Benefits under the tuition tax credit are not based on income or the amount of expenses a student has—it is based flatly on the number of students in a family. Thus, the student in a public university which has low tuition gets the same tax credit as a student in an expensive, private university whose costs are often 10 times that of the State university. Therefore students in private schools would be discriminated against, since they would get only a fraction of the relief that would go to students in public schools.

Mr. Chairman, our Ways and Means Committee has been urged to shift from deductions to tax credits in an effort to equalize the benefits of the Internal Revenue Code. A credit gives equal treatment to all taxpaying families, whereas a deduction gives greater benefits to wealthy people, who have more income to offset. In the case of tuition, however, an equal benefit for all persons regardless of income level, regardless of the actual expenses of the school, and regardless of need, shows clearly the bankruptcy of this proposal.

This inequity is further emphasized by figures from the Joint Committee on Taxation. More than 50 percent of the benefits would go to persons earning over $20,000 a year, and only 9 percent would go to persons earning less than $10,000. Since the credit is nonrefundable, those who pay no taxes would not get any benefits at all. A letter from the director of financial aid for one of the State universities in my district makes this argument well. He writes:

I cannot in good conscience support a tax credit measure which would provide $200 to $600 million to students from family income levels of $30,000 and above as indicated in the C.B.O.'s report. When many of our major State universities have inadequate funds to assist needy students—students who meet current criteria for eligibility—it seems unwise to provide blanket coverage to these families with incomes in excess of $50,000.

This brings me to another argument. With a significant Federal budgetary commitment to tuition tax credits, pressure will mount in Congress to halt funding increases for other education programs, such as the student financial aid programs that have opened the doors to a good education to poor and minority students. We have made significant progress in this area. Let us not take a step backward.

Mr. Chairman, I realize that many Members are concerned about the financial burden of education. I am concerned about it as well. I think a much more equitable means of dealing with this burden are proposals such as the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. HARRINGTON'S) tuition advance fund. I recently had the pleasure of discussing this with Mr. HARRINGTON and President John Silber of Boston University. This proposal would enable any student, regardless of income level, to receive an advance from the Federal Government of tuition plus up to $1,000 of expenses with a maximum of $5,000 annually. This advance would be repaid after graduation on a long-term basis.

Since it would be administered by the Internal Revenue Service through the annual income tax return, the possibility of default would be minimized. Many colleges and universities are capturing the tuition tax credit by raising tuition now in anticipation of its passage. This would not be possible with the tuition advance fund. Institutions participating would have to agree not to raise tuition above an amount keyed to the cost-of-living index.

Mr. Chairman, the tuition tax credit has a great initial appeal. Indeed, my own feelings about it are reflected in a letter I just received from one of my constituents. It says:

DEAR MR. FORD: As a parent of a college sophomore, my first opinion of the tuition tax bill was one of gratitude. Since I have given it more thought and am now aware of the full implication of this legislation, I ask you to vote against the bill.

The tuition advance fund, and not tuition tax credits, would direct aid where it is needed and allow all students, regardless of income level or background, to achieve their potential by removing cost as a barrier to higher education. I would urge the Members of the House to consider innovative proposals such as this and not the current bill.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANDERSON).

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I can certainly sympathize with the desire on the part of this body to aid the financially troubled middle-income taxpayer, and I sense that this legislation does grow out of the very pervasive tax revolt that seems to be spreading across the country. But, I find great problems with the fact that this legislation, which began in an effort to aid the parents of college-age children, has now been expanded—or will if we adopt the so-called Vanik amendment—will be expanded to become a vehicle that I think contains the seeds of some very, very dangerous changes, public policy-wise, for the whole public educational system of our country.

I am in receipt of a recent letter from the State of Illinois, State Board of Education, which in part reads as follows, and I quote:

The amendments to be offered on the floor have a mischievous effect on the governance of education. Assistance under the tax credit proposal does not flow through State and local agencies which can assist and monitor compliance with public policy goals. There is no mechanism to protect against racial and social isolation in non-public schools.

That is precisely what concerns me about the amendment that will shortly be offered to this legislation.

I have another communication from the superintendent of my own local school district, who is deeply disturbed by what he believes could be the financially ruinous impact of this legislation on the public school system in my own home community. Our State aid is administered on the basis of the number of students attending public schools and he has assured me that his studies convince him that there is going to be a flight to the private academies and that as a result we are going to find a shrinking base of State aid for our public school system. In addition to that we also have a voluntary integration program going on in our public school system at home at the present time which he feels is going to be ruined if we proceed with this approach.

Let me, if my time will permit, quote one of the reservations that I have which is best stated I think in some remarks contained in a speech delivered by Mr. Jerome Kurtz, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in a speech he made in January of this year. It deals with the argument that of course there will be no tendency on the part of this legislation to promote segregation because under the law for the tax credit to be available to an institution it must be operated on a nondiscriminatory basis, but let me read what Mr. Kurtz said:

Notwithstanding that the Service is committed to removing tax exemption from schools that discriminate racially, and has devoted significant resources to ensure that its enforcement activity is equal to the task of assuring nondiscriminatory admissions policies, certain troublesome questions persist. One question is how we should evaluate the bona fides of the admission policy of schools located in communities subject to desegregation orders that operate over a long period of time without actually enrolling any minority students. Does that fact create a presumption calling for more careful scrutiny? Might a similar rule be applicable even in the absence of local desegregation orders?

It is because I do not think that the Internal Revenue Service is qualified and competent, notwithstanding its best intentions, to carry out a policy of nonsegregation in the schools or in the school systems of our country that I feel that with the adoption of the so-called Vanik amendment—and I know the gentleman well enough to know that it is not his intent to promote segregation in education through his amendment—but notwithstanding that I have a fear, notwithstanding the gentleman's protest that is not his intent, that nevertheless it will be the effect of the adoption of his amendment.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. RINALDO).

Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the legislation, and in favor of the Vanik amendment to grant tax credits for nonpublic elementary and secondary education expenses.

This is a crucial bill. It represents one of those rare instances when we have a chance to help the people in this Nation who need help the most—middle-income Americans. They are all too often forgotten in the programs we consider here—even though they pay for them. They are not protesters, and they do not want charity.

But they do want a fair shake from Congress, and they have not been getting it. Today, through the Tuition Tax Credit Act, we can give them the help they justly deserve.

Time and again, we have seen Congress bestow benefits on various groups. Farmers receive subsidies. Large corporations get tax breaks. Billions of dollars are spent each year on food stamps, housing subsidies, and other assistance.

In the coming fiscal year, the Federal budget will top half a trillion dollars. Education alone amounts for $12.8 billion—an increase of over $2 billion from the current level of spending.

But this money does not go to private or parochial schools. It is primarily channeled to the over 90 percent of American children who attend public elementary and secondary schools throughout the Nation.

The Vanik amendment that we are considering today would go a long way toward eliminating this inequity.

It would grant tax relief directly to people who have been hit hard by inflation; who pay increasingly high property taxes for a public education their children do not receive; and who have gotten, at best, very little help from the Federal Government.

The opponents of this bill want things to stay that way. They do not want parochial and private schools to be supported. In fact, they probably would not care if parochial and private schools went out of existence entirely.

That type of attitude is dead wrong. I know from personal experience the tremendous contribution private and parochial schools make to our country.

As a cosponsor of the Tuition Tax Relief Act, I intend to see that they get the support from Congress that they deserve.

A majority of private schools students are from families with incomes of less than $15,000. Often they are considered too affluent to qualify for scholarship aid, but not affluent enough to bear the cost of a public or private education.

Tuition tax credits are no threat to public education, since not one dollar less will be spent on public education. Nor are they subsidies which will encourage parents to remove their children from public schools, which now enroll about 91 percent of all students.

What I fear for public education is the collapse of private education due to the pressures of Government-spawned inflation. The result would present our public schools and local taxpayers with enormous additional financial burdens. It would cost the States and local school districts at least $17 billion more if they had to educate the children now attending private and parochial schools.

My colleagues may be interested in the words of U.S. Commissioner of Education Ernest L. Boyer. On September 29, 1977, Commissioner Boyer stated:

> Private education is absolutely crucial to the vitality of this Nation, and public policy should strengthen rather than diminish these essential institutions.

Moreover, before he became President, Jimmy Carter was singing a different tune. On October 19, 1976, then-candidate Carter said:

> I am firmly committed to finding constitutionally acceptable methods of providing aid to parents whose children attend parochial schools.

In 1972, Secretary of the Treasury George Schultz testified before the Ways and Means Committee in favor of a tuition tax credit for elementary and secondary school students. Both major political parties have repeatedly endorsed the principle of aiding private and parochial schools and their students.

Mr. Chairman, this legislation is long overdue. It has been passed in similar form by the Senate, and the House of Representatives recently provided for funding of the measure in the first budget resolution.

I urge my colleagues to join me in pressing for passage of the Vanik amendment and passage of the bill. Without it, millions of Americans who are making a major contribution to the education of our youth will be shut out of Federal aid.

Mr. LENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RINALDO. I yield to the gentleman from New York (Mr. LENT).

Mr. LENT. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. RINALDO) for yielding to me and I want to join the gentleman in his statement.

Mr. Chairman, I rise today in support of H.R. 12050, the Tuition Tax Credit Act of 1978 and in support of the Vanik amendment which will extend tuition tax relief to parents of students attending nonpublic elementary and secondary schools, as well as colleges and universities. Adoption of this legislation will show middle income taxpayers in America that we recognize that taxes at all levels—Federal, State and local—are eroding the freedoms guaranteed under the Constitution. I am speaking of the freedom of choice in the education of our children.

For years, parents who chose to send their children to nonpublic schools have supported our dual education system. They pay local property taxes which provide the major source of support for our public school system, and they pay again, through tuition, for the right to send their children to the school of their choice. Our pluralistic society has been maintained because of this support, and I believe there are few if any among us who would question this.

Yet over the past decade, nonpublic schools have borne the brunt of declining school enrollments. While public secondary enrollments have risen by 18 percent in the last 10 years, comparable nonpublic school enrollments have decreased by 13 percent. In the same period, nonpublic elementary schools have lost 35 percent of their enrollment. The major reason for this decrease is the growing costs of maintaining our dual education system—costs borne disproportionately by nonpublic school parents. The Vanik amendment, by extending tuition tax relief to these taxpayers, will help assure the future of our pluralistic system which has served our Nation so well.

Make no mistake. I support our excellent public school system which educates some 90 percent of America's children, and I am a fervent supporter of our historic separation of church and state. I believe in the right of every individual to the freedom of choice and that extends to the choice of parents on how best to educate their children.

The law makes no requirement that children must attend public schools. Yet the combination of rising per pupil costs of public education, the ever growing tax burden, and rising tuition costs, work to deny this freedom of choice. Fewer and fewer families are able to afford to send their children to the school of their choosing as a result. It may not be too many years before all children could be forced to go to public schools, increasing the already heavy property tax burden on residents of local school districts.

Over the years we have nurtured our pluralistic society while retaining the traditional separation of church and state. That is as it should be it. I believe that tuition tax relief for parents of elementary and secondary school students poses no threat to that separation. Consider the fact that we allow tax deductions for charitable contributions, including those to churches. Moreover, the Supreme Court has upheld laws financing transportation to religious schools as well as loans of secular textbooks to students in nonpublic schools. The Supreme Court has upheld the tax exemption of church property, and nonpublic schools have been granted tax benefits consisting of exemptions of their income and property from income and property taxes. Thus, I see no constitutional problem in the logical extension of tuition tax relief to parents of elementary and secondary school students.

Moreover, the bill contains a provision for an expeditious ruling by the U.S. Supreme Court on the question of its constitutionality. This should resolve all doubts as to the legal validity of the tax credit for non-public-school tuition.

The choice of how to educate our children should be left to the individual. That choice should not be made by some Washington bureaucrat who is far removed from the local education system and who can tie up a taxpayer's money with redtape so tightly that he can never get it back when he needs it most. I say the taxpayer's money belongs to the taxpayer. Why should he have to give it to the Government, only to fight through the bureaucratic maze in an attempt to get a few pennies back?

Tuition tax relief assures freedom of choice at all levels of education. It provides this assurance in the most simple, direct, and practical way, without further expansion of our already massive bureaucracy. Tuition tax relief is an idea whose time has come. I support it at the college level and I support it at the elementary and secondary levels. I urge adoption of the Vanik amendment because it underscores congressional commitment to the future of our pluralistic democratic society.

Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from New York, Mr. LENT, for his statement.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, Mr. LEVITAS.

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Tuition Tax Credit Act of 1978, H.R. 12050, because it is a tax relief bill for middle-income taxpayers. While it is only a first step, it is a beginning.

The cost of college education today is becoming prohibitive. The low-income family can qualify for all manner of loans, scholarships, and grants to help defray the costs of college education. The wealthy can afford to educate their children by virtue of having enough money to choose whatever they please. But it is the middle class, the traditional backbone of this Nation, which is caught betwixt and between. Because middle-income families have parents who earn a middle-income living, they are prohibited from obtaining Government assistance which is directed solely at the low-income family. And a middle-class income level is simply not enough to manage the education of college-aged children at many schools in the country. The rising cost of higher education severely narrows the choices of the middle-income student. It would be unfortunate for this Nation if its middle-class were restrained from having higher educational opportunities.

Nor it is comforting to the middle-class family to be told that there is a proposed administration plan that may provide increased financial aid to families earning up to a maximum of $25,000 a year. Even at a pre-tax salary of $30,000, the middle-class parents may not be able to finance two or three children in college at the going rate of $3,000 to $5,000 a year. In some colleges that figure goes up to $8,000 a year. Why not allow the breadwinner and his or her family to make their own decisions and use the tax credit as they see fit. Why should we add to already inhibiting financial pressures by extending a large bureaucratic governmental apparatus to do his job for him? I believe we should allow a productive taxpaying citizen this decisionmaking power over his hard-earned resources. Indeed, one of the advantages of the tuition tax credit system is that it avoids a new bureaucracy, more Government cost, and more waste and redtape. It is simple to administer and leaves out Government involvement.

If we do not find a way to encourage the continuing higher education of the middle class in this country, and lessen the burden of taxation and inflation on them, we will be in serious trouble. This bill is a way to provide the middle-income people some relief and a wider range of educational choices.

The President's plan, to provide more direct Federal Government assistance to more families and to raise slightly the income level for qualification is an unacceptable alternative. It contains all the failings of all other Government programs: First, it will still exclude a major portion of middle-income students because it sets arbitrary limits for qualification in the program; second, it will require yet another Federal bureaucracy to administer the program; and third, it once again places the Federal Government in the position of handing out taxpayers' money to selected recipients.

Why cannot we let people make their own decisions about how to spend their own money?

This bill, H.R. 12050, will finally show that the Congress believes that taxpayers are better able to make such decisions than the Federal Government.

The fact is that this bill is not an education bill as such. This bill is a tax relief bill. This bill is the first effort in recent memory to provide some tax relief to the working, productive middle-income people. I hope it is only the first of many such steps to relieve the middle-class American who is being bled to death by the taxation burden he or she bears.

This bill, with the Vanik amendment, will provide tuition tax credits for both public and private college education and for secondary and elementary education tuition.

Nevertheless, let there be no mistake that our public education system is of primary importance and fundamental to our democratic institutions. Only an educated, informed, literate citizenry can participate in a democratic, representative government which demands of us opinions and decisions about how our Government will be conducted. Broadly available education means that there must be opportunities for every American. Public education means that every American will be made aware of those opportunities and have available to him or her the first step in attaining those opportunities. It must be supported. For example, later today or tomorrow, I intend to vote for the elementary and secondary education bill that will authorize approximately $10.3 billion for education for fiscal year 1979.

Public education is not free. Indeed, it is very expensive to taxpayers. But the cost is justifiable and worth it to our society because there is nothing more costly than education except ignorance. An uneducated populace can be our most costly deficit.

Therefore, the primacy of public education must be maintained and public education must be improved and strengthened. We must not do anything to hurt public education. This is of paramount importance when we realize that 90 percent of all children in elementary and secondary schools today are in public schools, while 10 percent attend private institutions.

However, we are a free society, and, while we have compulsory education laws, we have not compelled everybody to attend one school system. Many years ago, Oregon tried to restrict all children to one public school system, and the attempt was held unconstitutional.

Parents should have some substantial rights about the education of their own children.

In America, we have always countenanced and encouraged private, alternative educational options. Indeed, the private schools preceded public education in America, and were the basis for it. Americans have valued both education and freedom, from the beginning.

This is a free country which allows its citizens freedom of choice—particularly the freedom to decide what values and teachings one's own chilren should receive. Private schools can provide alternatives to public education because they can provide educational services to children with special needs. These schools can provide special types of education; they can be secular or partly religious; but the point is that they are an alternative, a choice, to parents.

However, inflation and steeply rising costs may not let that choice as free as we would like to believe it is.

This bill will enlarge the range of choices by providing a Federal income tax credit for tuition paid to an undergraduate college or post-secondary vocational school by a taxpayer for himself, his spouse, or any of his dependents. The credit would equal 25 percent of tuition paid by the taxpayer, with a maximum credit of $100 in 1978, $150 in 1979, and $250 in 1980 for each eligible student. Full-time and certain part-time students would be eligible for the credit. The credit would be effective August 1, 1978, and terminate after December 31, 1980, to allow time for congression evaluation of its effect and administration. In the event of any constitutional question, the bill provides for expedited judicial review of any legal proceeding which may be brought concerning the constitutional validity of the tuition tax credit.

Costs of books, supplies, transportation, and living expenses could not be included in the tuition amount on which the tax credit is computed. The base amount would be reduced by any nontaxable scholarship or educational allowance assistance.

If this bill is amended by the Vanik amendment, tuition tax credit for 25 percent of tuition actually paid will be extended to include elementary and secondary level education—up to $50 in 1978; $100 for 1979; and $100 maximum for 1980. I will not vote today for any amendment to increase the percentage of credit or the amount of the credit beyond these levels.

I could not support this bill if I believed for 1 minute that public education would be hurt in any way. I am fully convinced that it will not harm public education at all. It will, however, provide tax relief to some middle income taxpayers who are also paying their fair share of local property and State taxes to support public education as well.

Keep in mind that this bill does not take away anything from public education. It does not reduce the amount which goes into public education by one penny. There is no lessening of the Federal contribution to public education by the amount of tax credits taken in any given year.

A comparison of the amount of Federal taxpayer dollars to be spent on public education to the amount of their own money that middle-class taxpayers will be able to keep as a result of the tuition tax credit shows that the total amount spent by the Federal Government this year on public education will be about $12 billion. The anticipated amount of tuition tax credits in 1978 will be about $25 million. Even at the high point in fiscal year 1981, tuition tax credits will amount to about $1 billion while Federal expenditures on public education are estimated to be over $15 billion.

These comparative figures do not even include the even greater billions in State and local taxpayer dollars spent on public education. This modest tuition tax credit is hardly a threat to the funding of public education. Public education is getting at least its fair share of the taxpayer dollar.

Given the relatively small amount of tuition tax credit compared to the billions spent on public education from Federal taxpayers, can anyone seriously argue that this small tuition credit will hurt public education?

Given the maximum of $100 in tax credit and 25 percent limitation as well, the remaining 75 percent of tuition would not be eligible for credit. Would any parent not already seeking private education alternatives take his child out of public schools for 25 percent of the substantial tuition price and a $100 maximum? Will there really be a mass exodus from public schools for up to $100 a year per student? Hardly. And any public school system that is so threatened by that has far more serious problems.

I am disturbed, however, by the overstatement of the arguments by the opponents of this bill. These vigorous and able advocates of public education are saying that this bill "will destroy public education," or "sound its death knell," or pose the "most serious attack on public education since the Civil War." If believed by the public, these dangerous overstatements would be a damaging admission by public education that it is doing such a poor job and is in such bad shape that a modest tuition tax credit in the small amounts I have described would destroy public education. I hope those opponents of this bill do not really believe that to be true, and I urge them to voice their opposition in more realistic terms. I personally have more confidence and belief in the quality and strength of public education than those who argue that this modest tax relief bill will destroy or damage public education.

A bonus that I see this bill producing for American public education is good, old-fashioned competition. Competition has served this Nation well in all its endeavors. All our endeavors shine a little brighter in the light of competition. We try harder. We do better. We become more responsive to our patrons or constituencies. The continuation of a viable alternative private education system will provide the public education system with examples of performance and innovation to be compared to and to draw ideas from, as well as making the public education system managers more responsive to its public. The private education comparison for both educational quality and cost control is good for public education and its supporters.

Competition is healthy and helpful and perhaps this bill will assist in aiding public education through this measure.

There is a national dimension to this problem. While nationwide only 10 percent of students are in private schools, in certain parts of our country, the private schools are really a dual school system and play a major role in the education of boys and girls. In certain of our northern and midwestern cities, private schools educate a high percentage of the students. These private schools are seriously strapped by rising costs and their patrons are being hit with rising tuition costs. If they go under and their students have to be absorbed into the already severely strained public system, it could be disastrous. The heavily strained public schools would have to absorb thousands of new students, build new schools, and hire hundreds of new teachers—and raise property taxes to pay for it. It simply cannot be done. It would truly wreck and bankrupt these public school systems. There is an important need, from a national perspective, to maintain the viability of nonpublic schools in these critical areas by the modest tax credit bill before us. Where this situation exists, the parents of children who attend private schools are relieving the public school system of greater costs by paying for the private education of their children in addition to paying their full share of public school property taxes.

Some persons have raised the constitutional issue of separation of church and state because some private schools are church supported. If we can deduct contributions to churches and church-supported charities from our income taxes, contributions made directly to churches or synagogues, then how can it be unconstitutional to let a parent have a partial credit for a tuition paid for a child's education, even if the school is affiliated with a church? If a gift or contribution to a church-related school is fully deductible from income tax, why is a tuition credit improper?

It has also been suggested that private schools will skim off the best students and the most affluent students, leaving to the public system the poor, the minorities, the handicapped, and disciplinary problems. The facts are that minorities comprise 10 percent of all enrollment in nonpublic schools now. Public schools, because of geographical factors or desegregation, tend to be mostly white or black, rich or poor. Many private schools reach beyond defined geographic areas to attract a diverse population. In Chicago, 55 percent of all children in parochial schools are black. In New York, 60 percent of all children in Catholic schools are minority students. It would seem that diversity, pluralism, and variety, all important and traditional American characteristics and education in their own way, are alive and well in the nonpublic schools.

To answer the objection that private schools only serve the wealthy, 57 percent of all nonpublic students come from families with incomes between $10,000 and $25,000. In addition, 83 percent of the tax credits under this bill will be received by families with incomes under $28,000 per year.

As for the charges that this would help the "segregation academies" which exist in some places, this bill with the Vanik amendment, contains language which would limit the tuition tax credit for tuitions paid to schools that presently meet IRS standards for deductability relating to nondiscrimination. There are presently existing procedures for assuring compliance with these requirements.

I strongly support public education. In my 9 years in the Georgia legislature, I voted for and sponsored major bills to aid and improve public education. In my district, public education is popular and well supported. We have excellent public schools. Our citizens vote for bond issues and approve them. I have publicly supported these bond issues and public school support referenda. Ours is an area of good public education with strong community support; only about 10 percent of school-aged children attend nonpublic schools.

Nevertheless, a constituent poll I conducted recently in my district showed that 62.2 percent of those responding favored tuition tax credit legislation for college, secondary, and elementary education. Less than 35 percent of the respondents opposed this concept. Most of the people answering my poll are strong proponents of the public school system and many of them are childless or have grown children. Why would these people so strongly support tuition tax credits? The answer is that these people realize that this is truly a middle-income taxpayers' relief bill. People are desirous of tax relief for this overburdened group of Americans. They hope that this will just be the beginning; a harbinger of more to come, but the breakthrough is here. It is for that reason that I support this bill.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from New York (Mrs. CHISHOLM).

Mrs. CHISHOLM. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe at this particular hour that it is at all possible to change many of the votes in this Chamber because this is an election year and the question of being "a profile in courage" cannot be expanded upon in any way at this moment.

I merely want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the Founding Fathers of this country instituted a common public school system, a school system in which every element, every class of child, every segment of society would have the opportunity to get a free public education.

We recognize that there are difficulties in the public school system in this Nation, but we do not go about rectifying these difficulties by throwing out the baby with the bath water.

We know in terms of this tax credit that what we will see will be a proliferation of all kinds of schools in this country being instituted by just about every one of the 976 different religious denominations in this land. Every church that has a basement or that has space will begin to institute some type of school facilities in order to be able to receive these funds.

We also know that because of the intensive racial polarization in this country, and because of the manmade dangers in ethnic differences, the common school system is still the only instrument in America that is able to bring together children, that is able to bring together those elements in our society with different ethnic backgrounds and different cultural backgrounds, and what we will really be doing here is really moving away from faith and assurance in our public school system and moving in the direction of giving aid and comfort to just about every other type of private system in this country, parochial and otherwise. I think that we do have to recognize that we did make provisions for the middle-income parents of this country with respect to the colleges and the universities. We brought out the Middle-Income Student Assistance Act in which we did raise the levels of incomes so that these families and these students will be able to benefit. We know also in terms of our parochial and private students in this country that we have given aid to them. In one of the titles of our bills we provide for different kinds of benefits; we provide for bilingual education; we provide for transportation facilities; so it is not to say that we have neglected the middle-income parents in this country, nor can we say that we have neglected the parochial students in this country. What we are failing to recognize at this hour and at this moment is that we are failing to recognize the far-reaching implications and ramifications of this particular bill, which in another 3 or 4 years would run into billions of dollars, and the very same middle-income parents that we are attempting to satisfy here today will be the very ones that we will have to go back to and raise their taxes in order to take care of this great amount of money that will have to be used for parochial and public education.

Mr. Chairman, this is a very crucial hour in the history of this country. Our public school system now is in real danger. I know that it is a political year. I know that we have said that we have to be responsive to our constituents but I think also we recognize that our less powerful and less affluent constituents in this country are not usually those whose voices are raised, and that those voices are found in the majority of parents whose children attend public school system in this country.

If you can be a profile in courage this afternoon, please raise your right hands again and uphold the basic tenets of the U.S. Constitution. Be objective and recognize that we have made provisions for middle-income families in the Middle-Income Student Assistance Act and that we have made provisions for the parochial students through the bilingual programs, the textbooks, transportation, and all of the other benefits. Let us be honest; it is a political year. Expediency is the question, and we must take care to address ourselves to the far-reaching ramifications of this piece of legislation here today.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. FISH).

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that one thing everyone here will agree with is that the cost of higher education is skyrocketing and is rapidly moving out of the reach of a large segment of our society—the middle-income American. All of us have heard the same appeals from constituents asking that Congress do something about this most pressing problem. The question is—as is always the case—what should that something be?

It is my contention that this problem did not occur overnight. There were indications, as early as 1970, when I first introduced my tuition trust fund legislation, that all was not right with our postsecondary educational system. We failed for years to address ourselves to the problem of increasing education costs, and today we must come up with an immediate solution, which I believe will not address the long-term concerns of many parents.

Mr. Chairman, we in the House will be considering two proposals, one offered by the Ways and Means Committee providing for tuition tax credits, the other offered by Mr. MIKVA and Mr. KETCHUM, which provides for a higher education tuition tax deferral. Both plans intend to provide the American parent with short-term relief in helping cope with the high cost of a postsecondary education. In addition, the administration has offered a third approach, not to be considered today, providing help through a vastly increased program of loans and grants from the Federal Government.

Over the past few months, the tuition tax credit concept has received a great deal of publicity and has become a symbol for the middle-income taxpayer who is tired of paying for a Government which is overbearing, bureaucratic, and expensive. The tax deferral program has surfaced in the last few weeks as a counterproposal to the committee recommended bill. These actions demonstrate the undeniable need to affect a suitable remedy.

Mr. Chairman, as I stated earlier, the proposals we are considering today are short-term remedies. In the beginning of this Congress, I reintroduced what I believe is the most suitable long-term solution to the problem of providing a higher education to the children of middle-income families.

My Higher Education Trust Fund Act, H.R. 1585, will permit parents to set aside in a tax-free trust, up to $750 for each child or 15 percent of their gross income (whichever is less). If, for any reason the funds are not used for the education of a dependent, the total amount would then become taxable income.

In addition to establishing the trust fund, this legislation expands the definition of higher education to include business, trade, vocational and professional schools, similar to those now approved for VA programs.

When I originally introduced this legislation in 1970, I felt there was a dire need for some vehicle by which middle-income families could meet the high cost of college by putting aside a small amount of money per year to send their children to a university, college, or trade school. The reasons for my introducing this bill in 1970 are even more pertinent today—as is evidenced by our actions today.

Over the past 5 years, the cost of higher education in both private and public institutions has outstripped the rise of the cost of living. The direct result of this is the fact that parents in the middle-income range $12,000 to $25,000 are not affluent enough to afford this expense, or find it difficult to qualify for Government assistance programs. Therefore, they are being forced to forego additional education for their children. As of January 1975, less than 4 percent of funds from the basic educational opportunity grant program went to students from families earning more than $12,000 per year, while almost 44 percent went to families earning less than $6,000 and 65 percent to families earning less than $9,000.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want this statement to be misconstrued. The BEOG program is desperately needed as it is one of the only avenues open to those young people from low-income families that want to pursue a higher education. What I am merely pointing out is that the average American family is finding it increasingly impossible to educate their children beyond high school. This is reflected by the startling decline in the enrollment of our young people from middle-income families in institutions of higher learning.

The primary benefits to be derived from my legislation include: first, more of our Nation's youth will be given the opportunity to pursue a higher education leading to the career of their choice and they will not be frustrated by the lack of funding; second, encouragement of parents to sensibly plan and build for their children's education over a number of years; third, increased deposits in our thrift institutions which will free money for capital investments; fourth, there is no need to increase the Federal bureaucracy to handle this program; and fifth, this legislation may result in a decrease in the demand for federally guaranteed loans.

If incomes continued to expand throughout our working lives, there would be no need for such legislation. The fact remains, however, that increasing numbers of able young people are prevented from going on to college because they just cannot afford it. The major problem faced by parents is that college costs hit at a time in their lives when other family costs are at a maximum and earning levels have tended to stabilize. This legislation would provide an incentive for setting aside money during those earlier years when income is often in better balance with family needs.

Mr. Chairman, my legislation is a long-term solution. I am very aware of the need to effect a short-term remedy to aid those parents who are in need of immediate relief—which brings us here today. Beyond that, I submit, we need a commonsense approach—one that provides significant relief—one that looks ahead at the future needs of the American parent who wants to provide the best possible education for his child.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. FORD).

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the bill as reported by the committee and in opposition to the amendments that have been made in order; however, I find myself in a position where if either or both of the amendments offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) are adopted, I will then have to reluctantly support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA), because it will be the only opportunity we have to clean up this bill.

Mr. Chairman, this piece of legislation is the wrong piece of legislation at the wrong time, making fraudulent promises to people across this country that the legislation will never keep. This legislation has no real value to the people who need assistance most in the nonpublic schools in this country.

The approach that we have been using in the Committee on Education and Labor in continually expanding within constitutional limits aid to the nonpublic schools will do more for nonpublic school students than this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, as the House begins debate on tuition tax credits, I would like to offer a general overview and summary of some of the most important arguments on this issue.

Tax credits are inequitable and untargeted. Irrespective of their need all families receive the same benefits. Indeed, a high proportion of the benefits would be received by upper income families. Forty-six percent of the benefits of the Tuition Tax Credit Act of 1978 would go to families with incomes above $25,000. The distribution of the benefits is identical if the bill is amended to include elementary and secondary education.

Tuition tax credits provide small benefits to a small group of taxpayers. When fully implemented, H.R. 12050 will provide a maximum of $250 credit for postsecondary education not to exceed 25 percent of tuition and required fees.

All families supporting students in postsecondary education will not receive the full $250 since other grant assistance for tuition is subtracted from tuition before computing the credit. In addition, those attending low tuition schools will receive less than the maximum. Those families with no tax liability and those who support students attending zero-tuition schools, graduate students or students attending less than half time will receive no help at all. Even those receiving the maximum $250 credit will obviously be getting little real help when average costs at public 4-year colleges will be $4,264 in the coming academic year and average costs at private 4-year colleges will be $5,110.

If the bill is amended to include elementary and secondary education, the maximum credit will be $100 not to exceed 25 percent of tuition. To assess the real impact of this credit let us consider the situation of Catholic elementary schools. Parents of students in these schools would be the primary beneficiaries of an elementary and secondary school tax credit since 85 percent of all students in nonpublic schools attend religious schools and 75 percent of that group attend Catholic schools. According to Rev. John Myers, president of the National Catholic Educational Association, the average tuition in Catholic elementary schools is about $200. With the maximum credit of $100 not to exceed 25 percent of tuition, these parents would receive only $50. There are going to be a lot of disappointed families who have heard the talk about $500 or $250 credits.

There are 74 million families and separate households in the United States. Only about 8 percent of these tax paying units would be eligible for the postsecondary tax credit given the restrictive coverage of the bill which excludes graduate students, those who study less than half time, those who pay no taxes and those who pay no tuition.

If the bill is amended to include elementary and secondary education, it will provide a credit to only about 3.5 percent of the families and separate households in the United States. Since some families have children in both postsecondary education as well as in nonpublic elementary or secondary school, a bill which includes a tax credit for elementary, secondary and postsecondary education will reach no more than about 10 percent of all the taxpayers in the Nation. Surely the tax cut bill, which will be before us later this session, will enable us to provide more equitable tax relief to hard-pressed taxpayers in a more equitable way than tuition tax credits which clearly serve only a small segment of the population.

In addition to providing small and almost meaningless benefits, the timing of tuition tax credits does not make them very helpful to families. Educational expenses must be paid, particularly in postsecondary education, at the beginning of the school year or the semester. The tax credit will not be available until the following spring. The major problem faced by middle-income families supporting students in postsecondary education is a cash flow or liquidity problem. They need cash in hand when the bills are due.

The existing Federal student aid programs put money in the hands of students when they need it to pay the bills. For example, under the existing programs as expanded by the Middle Income Student Assistance Act, a student from a family with an income of $25,000 attending a private college with a cost of $4,800 could receive a package of assistance from grants, work opportunities and loans of $3,000. It is obvious, at least to me, that $3,000 in the student's hands in September is more help than a $250 tax credit to the family in April.

It is also clear that a tuition tax credit would not increase access to education because it would not be available to the family or the student who cannot afford to pay the costs of postsecondary education at the time they need the money. Nor would the student or the family receive enough help from a tuition tax credit to make a difference particularly when compared to the expansion of the existing programs provided by the Middle Income Student Assistance Act.

The Tuition Tax Credit Act of 1978 obviously provides ridiculously small benefits that are of no real help to families faced with rising college costs in particular. There will, therefore, be an inevitable pressure to increase the amount of the credit, thereby both escalating the cost and compounding the inequity in the distribution of the benefits. Realistically we have to consider for a starter something like the Packwood-Moynihan bill with its $500 credit and $5 billion price tag. At this more realistic level of revenue loss, one has to consider the impact of a tuition tax credit on the level of support for existing Federal education programs. In this era of budgetary stringency, it is foolish to consider that a large revenue loss for a tuition tax credit will not be traded off against continued support for the existing programs by both OMB and the Congressional Budget Committees. If we enact a tax credit, the programs which will have to be cut back or at least not expanded will be the largest and most expensive of our current programs: the elementary and secondary compensatory education program supported by title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, education of the handicapped (Public Law 94-142), the basic educational opportunity grant and vocational education. Thus tuition tax credits will provide a small proportion of American families, who are disproportionately the comfortable and the affluent, with a little tax break while sacrificing assistance to the vulnerable of our society: the disadvantaged, the poor, the handicapped, and those in need of job skills.

Tuition tax credits will put an inflationary pressure on the tuitions of postsecondary institutions and nonpublic schools. Those postsecondary institutions which charge no tuition or a low tuition, where families cannot take full advantage of the credit, will be tempted to raise their tuition to "capture" the full tax credit. This situation will also hold for elementary and secondary schools, if they are included in the bill. Raising the credit from 25 to 50 percent of tuition, as is proposed in one amendment, will only increase this inflationary pressure.

The rhetoric about a simple one-line entry on the tax form to obtain the tuition tax credit is simply a lie and a fraud. On May 23, I placed in the RECORD (page E2770) an analysis of what a taxpayer would have to go through in order to claim the credit for postsecondary education. I will not repeat that analysis here, but it is clear that a complex new schedule involving complicated computations and extensive recordkeeping will be required.

Furthermore the Treasury Department and the Internal Revenue Service will be required to devise new regulations defining an eligible educational institution, tuition and required fees, part-time and full-time student, "a general course of study", et cetera. The Internal Revenue Service would also have a major new responsibility for monitoring and auditing individuals and educational institutions to assure compliance with the conditions for receiving the credit. In short, an expanded bureaucracy would be required and a new Federal regulatory burden would be placed on taxpayers and educational institutions.

Tuition tax credits would result in a further fragmentation of Federal education policy. With all due respect to my colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee, who do an outstanding job on a great many complex issues, they are not experts on education policy. Giving this already overburdened committee a major responsibility for education policy would serve neither the interest of education nor of the committee. The Treasury Department would also assume a major role in education. Recognizing the limits of his Department, Treasury Secretary Blumenthal has shown absolutely no interest in taking on this additional responsibility.

If the bill is amended to provide a tuition tax credit for nonpublic elementary and secondary school, the question of the constitutionality of the measure arises.

Attorney General Bell, in a letter to the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, said:

> In light of existing Supreme Court precedents, it is my opinion that tax programs of the sort contemplated . . . would be held unconstitutional insofar as they would provide aid at the elementary and secondary school levels.

A memorandum prepared for the Attorney General concludes, primarily on the basis of the Nyquist case, that an elementary and secondary tuition tax credit would have "a primary effect" of advancing religion. Such a tax credit would also risk creating an "excessive entanglement" between the Federal Government and religion.

Tuition tax credits for elementary and secondary education would also encourage the proliferation of segregation academies. The Internal Revenue Service currently has the responsibility for assuring that educational institutions which are granted nonprofit tax-exempt status are nondiscriminatory. Arthur Flemming, the Chairman of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, in a recent letter to Congresswoman CHISHOLM notes "that the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) has failed to carry out effectively its civil rights enforcement responsibilities." Chairman Flemming concludes:

> Enactment of legislation authorizing tax credits for tuition paid to private elementary and secondary schools which are recognized as tax-exempt organizations under the Internal Revenue Code would effectively increase Federal support of school segregation in direct violation of the Constitution.

The bill as reported contains another assault on civil rights. Section 2(c) of the bill states:

> Any educational institution which enrolls a student for whom a tax credit is claimed under this Act shall not be considered to be a recipient of Federal assistance under this Act.

This means that if a school received no Federal assistance other than the tax credits funneled through the parents of students, the school would not be required to comply with title VI of the Civil Rights Act, which prohibits discrimination on the basis of race or national origin; title IX, which prohibits discrimination on the basis of sex, and section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act, which prohibits discrimination against the handicapped. Either the IRS will have to beef up its enforcement and its intrusion into the affairs of schools or segregation academies will be allowed to flourish; you cannot have it both ways. Any additional IRS enforcement would, of course, be in addition to and somewhat duplicative of the civil rights enforcement effort already being carried out by the Office of Civil Rights in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

Section 2(c) also flies in the face of the decisions of the Supreme Court which say that the Court will look at the "effects" of a policy rather than at its stated purpose or intent. Section 2(c) seeks to define out of existence the effects of a tuition tax credit by saying that we will pretend that a school receives no benefits from a tax credit received by a family solely because their children are paying tuition to the school.

A tuition tax credit for elementary and secondary schools which promotes segregation academies and which allows schools to be exempt from all civil rights laws lends credence to the view that tuition tax credits will lead to making the public schools the dumping ground for the poor, minorities, the handicapped, slow learners, and behavior problems. Everyone else can "choose" to attend a nonpublic school, if, of course, the nonpublic school "chooses" to accept them. It is interesting to note that those who choose the nonpublic schools and who are chosen by them are primarily the more affluent and nonminorities. In 1975, only 4 percent of children from families with incomes less than $5,000 were in private schools, 17 percent of children from families with incomes above $25,000 were in private schools, and 25 percent of children from families with incomes above $50,000 were in private schools. Seventeen percent of all white children attend private schools while only 5 percent of minority children do so.

Tuition tax credits are bad educational policy and an inequitable means of providing tax relief. They would erode support for our national commitment to high quality free public education for all and undermine the civil rights guarantees provided by our laws and the Constitution.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time for the moment.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. MAGUIRE).

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, I wish it were not necessary, but I feel it is important to comment today on the tactics—the deplorable tactics—used by a few community leaders who have strongly felt I should vote for the Vanik amendment to extend tuition tax credits to primary and secondary private schools. In fact, they appear to have felt it so strongly that they have abandoned the reason and fairness which we always hope will characterize our discussion of even the most perplexing and emotional issues. Instead of engaging in the politics of legitimate persuasion, there have been a few who chose to orchestrate what I can only term—and I am most sorry to say this, but it is accurate—a campaign of deceiving the public and intimidating me and my staff. To the extent that such tactics succeed in swaying votes in this Chamber, I believe it is not too strong to say democracy itself is imperiled. My constituents deserve representation and leadership undeflected by those few who would pursue their ends through whatever methods they deem will serve their purposes.

The lobbying tactics to which I have alluded, and the incidents to which I will refer, were not isolated, but were part of a pattern originating from identifiable sources in the area I represent.

Let me hasten to say, however, that most proponents of the Vanik amendment in my district conducted themselves responsibly and should be commended and encouraged to continue sharing with me their thoughts and views. In this group I include the New Jersey Catholic Conference which discussed with me the merits of the issue, responded to questions I raised several weeks ago, and remained in touch with my staff. I also include the several thousand citizens who wrote me, many for the first time, indicating their strong and sincere conviction that the high cost of tuition is a problem Government should address through tax credit legislation. Many of these constituents reiterated misstatements passed on to them by the community leaders to whom I have referred. But they acted out of a genuine belief—unfortunately misplaced—that these leaders would not purposely deceive them. These citizens who wrote to me deserve thanks and encouragement.

Let me summarize some of the events that occurred in the days following my meeting in Washington with a delegation from the Archdiocese of Newark led by Richard Corrado, superintendent of schools.

My district and Washington office received many calls designed to intimidate me and members of my staff. Name calling was a favorite technique. At various times I was called a pig and warned that "God would get you."

Church bulletins and letters sent home with children by private school officials stated without qualification that I was opposed to tuition tax credits, despite my explicit statements to the delegation from the archdiocese that I would study my position with respect to primary and secondary schools and welcomed additional discussion. (Aside from the inaccuracy of what was contained in the bulletins, there is serious question in my mind about the ethical propriety—if not the legality—of using churches or church school facilities, equipment, staff, and funds for such political or lobbying purposes.)

In the Advocate, the newspaper of the Newark Archdiocese, a report attributed to Mr. Corrado stated:

> I could sum up his (Maguire's) attitude as "strong indifference".

It is beyond me how such an interpretation could be lifted from a frank and long 1½ hour meeting in which a host of arguments pro and con were freely discussed and in which I told the visitors of my deep concern, my commitment to private education, my agonizing over the vote, and my desire to receive additional materials and keep in close contact as I make my decisions.

One priest, who had not been at the meeting, wrote to complain of the "shabby way" he heard I received the school representatives. These incredibly unfair interpretations were later specifically rejected by those who were present, but were widely circulated in the district anyway. Should the lesson be that next time I should not have a candid discussion of the issues with my constituents?

A seventh grade youngster wrote to cancel a scheduled photo on the Capitol steps with myself and her parochial school class saying that I "should understand the obvious reasons." Mr. Corrado later admitted such a letter would not have been initiated by the child. (May I suggest that if a school administrator wanted to cancel a photograph of the students with their Congressman as an act of pressure or protest, then that school administrator should have contacted the congressional office over his or her own name, taking responsibility for that decision, rather than using a child?)

In a case where the most outrageous statements were made falsely characterizing my views—"Did you know that Mr. MAGUIRE thinks that parents of nonpublic school children are rich?" In a letter distributed to parochial school parents through students, I was offered an opportunity by the school administrator to set the record straight in a letter of my own to be distributed in the same way. I agreed and prepared such a letter. Despite the earlier promise, school officials refused to distribute my response. Even when a subsequent meeting with parents was held on the subject, the letter was not passed out, reportedly because permission to do so had not been received from Mr. Corrado's office in Newark.

What was contained in written form in the letter was typical of what was spread widely by word of mouth to many who had an interest and assumed they were being told the truth. The original letter, and my response which was never circulated, are reproduced at this point in the RECORD:

AN IMPORTANT MESSAGE

Do you know:

(1) that Andrew Maguire is against tax credits for parents of non-public school children?

(2) that our school and others like to save the tax payers $26 million each year?

(3) that total Tuition Tax Credit countrywide would be less costly than one bomber?

(4) that Mr. Maguire thinks that parents of non-public school children are rich?

(5) that Congressman Maguire does not believe middle class parents need the tax relief?

(6) that Mr. Maguire feels since most families in Bergen County have two incomes coming in they can easily afford tuitions?

We have just 10 days to educate Mr. Maguire and to change his mind to vote in support of the legislation that would benefit all parents of children in non-public schools with much needed tax relief. One of the most effective ways to do this is to demonstrate our strength and our desires in an overwhelming mail campaign. Please take time to hand write him and remind him that we are the people who elected him, and that it is our own tax dollars that we want to share in. Suggested form letters have been prepared for your convenience.

DEAR SISTER: Thank you for suggesting that I respond to the letter sent to all the parents of the children of the Immaculate Conception School. I deeply appreciated your courtesy, the opportunity to talk with you, and your offer to circulate my statement to all those who received the earlier letter.

As I told you, I was deeply disappointed by the systematic misrepresentation of my views contained in the letter. Each time my name was mentioned in the letter, the statement characterizing my views was either inaccurate or entirely false.

Let me respond to the specific points.

1. I have not taken a final position on tuition tax credits for parents of non-public elementary and secondary school children—a point I have specifically made to those who have contacted me on the matter. I believe strongly in the importance of maintaining the viability of private schools, in access to these schools for those whose families choose private education, and in the need to provide some significant form of assistance to achieve this.

If tax credits are approved, I believe they should include changes to treat millionaires differently from the economically hard-pressed. I also feel that there may be other forms of assistance which would be more helpful to parents and schools than a modest tax credit, and I have been actively exploring this. I am also aware, as you are, of the past constitutional problems encountered by attempts to provide aid to private schools. If tuition tax credits are the only possibility for such aid, that is a strong argument in their favor.

2. Contrary to the statements contained in the letter, I have never said or thought that parents of non-public school children are rich. I have never said or thought that middle class parents don't need tax relief. I am in fact one of the strongest advocates in Congress of tax reform and tax relief that would benefit middle class families, as any review of my record will make plain. I have never said or thought that most families in Bergen County have two incomes and therefore can easily afford tuition. I am very disturbed that anyone would falsely state my views on these matters.

I deeply regret that, after meeting with the delegation of the Archdiocesan Schools, flagrant misrepresentation of my views would be freely circulated. Whatever my final position on tuition tax credits for elementary and secondary private schools, I appreciate this opportunity to clarify for you and the parents of your school children what I in fact do feel on this issue. Without basic accuracy and honesty in such matters, there cannot be real communication between people.

With all best wishes,

ANDREW MAGUIRE,
Member of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, in a conversation with Superintendent Corrado about this and similar inaccurate, false, and deceptive statements which were being systematically circulated in oral and written communications with parents, I was advised that it was "the impression" of my views that any participant saw fit to carry away from our meeting, rather than my views themselves as I stated them, that determined the legitimacy of any subsequent characterization of those views. I was also told that since I could not be counted as "for" tuition tax credits, it was all right to tell parents without qualification that I was "against" tuition tax credits—even though this meant ignoring my explicit statement that I was still studying the issue and welcomed additional materials and discussion.

This and similar argumentation from Mr. Corrado in defense of the catalog of falsehoods and distortions to which I was subjected would make the most accomplished casuist blush for shame—and would suggest the absolute necessity of a tape recorder at all such future meetings.

One does not want to feel that tape recorders will be necessary in meetings with any constituents. One does not want to believe that deception is deliberate. One does not want to think that statements of one's views would not be checked for accuracy before they are printed and circulated. One does not want to accept the fact that after falsehoods are identified an agreement to circulate a correcting statement is not honored. One does not want to see a small number of representatives of a distinguished religious tradition, using the resources and the good faith upon which they are privileged to draw, orchestrate a campaign of intimidation and deception to achieve a political or public policy objective.

But this is what happened on this issue in my district this year. And it is very regrettable.

When I vote later today I intend to avoid reacting either for or against the Vanik proposal as a result of what I have described. I intend to cast my vote—on a most complex and difficult issue—on the merits, and I will explain my vote at that time.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. SIMON).

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, the bill as it stands right now applies only to higher education, and it is a radical departure from what we have done up to this point in the field of higher education.

Up to this point in the field of higher education we have provided assistance with two things in mind: No. 1, need; and No. 2, that we are going to encourage attendance at our institutions of higher education.

We have tossed out need completely in this bill, and, secondly, there is absolutely no evidence that this is going to encourage attendance at higher education institutions.

On the need factor, what we are asked to do is this: We are supposed to hand over, depending on the year, $100 or $250 to a taxpayer, whether that person earns $10,000 or $100,000 in a year. That, I suggest, is not sound public policy.

My distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK), says there is going to be no red tape in this. We keep every present program; we do not eliminate one bit of red tape, and if you would take a look at the bill, starting on page 6, we find that we are compounding the red tape problem.

Then the two Vanik amendments will be pending, and if they are adopted, we will add $1.2 billion in costs in the next fiscal year over and above the costs that are already in the bill, according to the Congressional Budget Office.

Just yesterday we heard about 10 percent inflation rates. We make speeches about what we ought to be doing about inflation, and here we are today adding, in an unsound manner, something that I do not believe is going to help education in this Nation and something that is not founded on the basis of need. If we approve these proposals we will increase the deficit, and have an inflationary impact.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, the President has said he is going to veto this bill. Let us not raise false hopes and deceive the people. This proposal is going to go down the drain, and the sooner we recognize that, the better off the Nation will be.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. MITCHELL).

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, again I take to the well to urge the defeat of this legislation, and I have three or four good reasons why it ought to be defeated, above and beyond those which I mentioned when we debated the rule.

No. 1, the initial cost of this, if we include elementary and secondary education, is $1.2 billion loss of revenue in a year. The ultimate cost is $5.8 billion in lost revenue. We cannot afford that.

No. 2, there is the constitutional issue. And it is clearly a constitutional problem if we move this bill as it is written.

Mr. Chairman, I have a great deal of respect for the Roman Catholic schools, and I want to commend them for being the first to desegregate in Maryland, which has a heavy Roman Catholic population. However, despite that, we have to take a stand on principles, and we have to learn to live with the Constitution of the United States, which says "separation of."

The third reason why this bill ought to be defeated, even with any amendments put on it, is that it does do damage to race relations. It does open up the door for resegregation of the public schools. It does open up the door for the establishment and proliferation of those schools which have but one intent, and that is to avoid bringing children of any color or any description together. That is dangerous, and I think we ought to defeat it.

Finally, I think this bill ought to be defeated because if we go back to just the simple issue that I raised when we debated the rule, unless you protect us against flaunting title IX, title VII, title VI, and other titles in the Civil Rights Act, if you pass it, then you are going to have endless litigation between recipients, on the one hand, in reference to that exemption section, and the provisions which are covered under the IRS.

Mr. Chairman, I say to my colleagues that it is a political year and we do have pressures exerted on us. But do not bend to those pressures. Stand for the Constitution, and vote this bill down.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. PANETTA).

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I have some basic constitutional concerns with regards to this legislation, but I wanted to specifically address one section that raises concerns in my mind with regards to the ability of the Federal Government to enforce laws that relate to the providing of Federal assistance.

On page 9 of the bill, there is a section (c), which states:

"TAX CREDIT NOT TO BE CONSIDERED AS FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO INSTITUTION.—Any educational institution which enrolls a student for whom a tax credit is claimed under this Act shall not be considered to be a recipient of Federal assistance under this Act."

And the question I would direct to the distinguished chairman, if he would yield for this, is: Does this section in any way limit the Federal Government's jurisdiction to enforce basic laws relating to Federal assistance?

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, in response to my distinguished colleague, who refers to the language of the so-called Archer amendment found on page 9, lines 8 through 12, the purpose of this language is to insure that the Federal Government is not able to impose educational and curricular mandates on private, church-related schools. It is not intended and does not permit any racial discrimination. No school would be eligible for the credit if it discriminates. Both the bill and the court decisions insure nondiscrimination.

Mr. PANETTA. Carrying on with that discussion, it is my understanding that the courts have in fact, held that tax exemptions provided by the Federal Government are in fact, indirect forms of Federal assistance and the question that arisis in my mind, if the gentleman will yield further, is: Are we trying to prejudge what a court might determine to be Federal assistance? Is the gentleman in fact saying that tax credits are not Federal assistance? That is the point I am trying to make. Why is this provision here if it is not needed?

Mr. VANIK. If the gentleman will yield further, Mr. Chairman, I think I responded to the basic question.

I cannot tell the gentleman what the courts might do in some of the decisions relating to the tax issue.

I have the assurance of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that he is going to enforce the law. As a matter of fact, I was chairman of the Subcommittee on Oversight of the Committee on Ways and Means, and insisted that these provisions of law be carefully monitored and respected by the Service. I think they have done an exemplary job.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to direct the gentleman's attention to a letter which was sent to Arthur S. Flemming on May 31, 1978, by Commissioner Jerome Kurtz addressing itself right to this issue.

Rather than read it, Mr. Chairman, I will insert it in the RECORD at this point.

The letter referred to follows:

Mr. ARTHUR S. FLEMMING,
Chairman, Commission on Civil Rights, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CHAIRMAN FLEMMING: Thank you for your letter of May 16, 1978, enclosing a copy of your letter and a memorandum to Representative Shirley Chisholm expressing the Commission's views on the civil rights implications of the tuition tax credit bill now pending before the Congress.

We have a number of comments on your discussion in the letter and memorandum of the IRS' enforcement of the nondiscrimination requirement for private schools exempt from federal income tax under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code. The Service has been very actively working on revising our procedures in this area for the past six months or so. Therefore, we would have appreciated an opportunity to discuss our progress with you so that your comments could have taken these current developments into account. There are a number of areas in which we believe clarification of your letter and memo is appropriate.

As you state, the IRS' published position since July 1970 is that a private school which has a racially discriminatory policy is not charitable under the common law concepts reflected in section 501(c)(3) and therefore does not qualify for exemption from federal income tax under that section. This position, subsequently published in Revenue Ruling 71-447, 1971-1 C.B. 230, was announced during the pendency of Green v. Connally, 330 F. Supp. 1150 (D. D.C. 1970), aff'd sub nom. Coit v. Green, 404 U.S. 997 (1971), and is in accordance with the decision in that case. As you state, the Green case involved a challenge to the charitable tax exemption of private schools located in Mississippi, and the court imposed certain affirmative obligations on the Service in revoking or denying exemption of discriminatory private schools in that state.

In accordance with the injunction in the Green decision, the Service reviewed the admission policies of all private schools located in the state of Mississippi holding individual exemptions, including the seven schools mentioned in your letter, and revoked the exemption of 33 private schools in that state. Exemptions were continued only for such of those schools that submitted the information required by the Green court and publicized a racially nondiscriminatory policy as to students at that time in accordance with the directions of the court.

The Service has taken a number of further steps to enforce this policy since the Green decision and since the date of the decisions cited in the Civil Rights Commission memorandum. In fact, these additional steps are consistent with recommendations of the Civil Rights Commission in your report issued in January of 1975, The Federal Civil Rights Enforcement Effort—1974, Vol. III, To Ensure Equal Educational Opportunity.

In 1975, the Service issued Revenue Procedure 75-50, which imposes affirmative obligations on all private schools to adopt formally a nondiscriminatory policy in their charter or bylaws; to include reference to that policy in all school brochures and catalogues; and to publish or announce annually this racially nondiscriminatory policy. That same year, Revenue Ruling 75-231, 1975-1 C.B. 158, clarified that church-related schools are also subject to a nondiscrimination requirement. In addition, we have also substantially increased audit coverage in this area, and have instituted examination guidelines, check-sheets, training material, and other procedures designed to assist agents examining the schools in determining if a school is in fact facially nondiscriminatory.

We are aware of the criticism made by some that schools can in some cases allege that they are racially nondiscriminatory and comply with all our procedural requirements in order to secure a tax exemption, yet in operation exclude minorities. In this regard, we are particularly concerned about schools which have in the past either been adjudicated by a court to be racially discriminatory, or which were established in the wake of public school desegregation and continue to have no or insubstantial minority enrollment, but which now claim to have a nondiscriminatory policy. As I mentioned earlier, in the past few months, we have been actively reviewing our rules and procedures and expect shortly to propose additional guidelines to test a school's assertion of a nondiscriminatory policy.

The Service is strongly committed to vigorous enforcement of the racial nondiscrimination requirements of section 501(c)(3). However, with approximately 16,000 exempt private schools in the country and with limited audit resources, the Service is not in a position to guarantee that every school is in fact operating in accordance with its representations that it is racially nondiscriminatory. As in all areas of our self-assesment tax system, the Service must rely on the assertions of exempt organizations unless those assertions are brought into question on audit or by outside information.

We would appreciate the opportunity of discussing in further detail the Service's enforcement activities in this area, as our staffs have done on several occasions over the last few years. If we can provide you with any further information on this matter, please let me know.

With kind regards,

Sincerely,

JEROME KURTZ.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. BROWN).

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee, I want to make a couple of remarks about the tuition tax credit based on the demographic changes that are likely to affect colleges through declining enrollments over the next few years.

My view also has application to elementary and secondary schools. Those enrollment statistics have changed already and I predict the impact on the Nation's colleges which we can expect in the future.

One of the communities in my district anticipates that the enrollment in its elementary and secondary schools by 1985 will drop to the extent of 35 to 40 percent from what it has been at its peak—perhaps even more, depending on the nature of the dynamics of the economics of that community. That impact of declining enrollment is going to hit the colleges eventually.

Mr. Chairman, we have a choice, it seems to me, as Members of Congress, as to how the issue of which colleges are to survive should be resolved. We have a choice as to whether we want that choice made by the individual citizens who will be using the services of those colleges or whether the Congress or Washington bureaucrats decide which colleges survive. I would suggest letting parents and students decide is much preferable to our making an elitist decision out of Washington.

Mr. Chairman, I met recently with the presidents of colleges which belong to a consortium in my district. That consortium involves about 10 institutions. They vary from institutions which have a very strong religious orientation to community colleges, to State universities, to all-black institutions, and some are residence institutions, some are commuter schools, some are philosophically very liberal, and some are very conservative institutions.

In that geographic area the issue that this variation of institutions raises is, "Which ones are going to survive when we lose that 30 or 40 percent of enrollment of college students?"

Mr. Chairman, I do not think that this Congress ought to make that decision. I know that the enrollment decline will not result in all of those institutions surviving and all having about 60 percent of their present size. The fact is, each institution will be competing, one against the other.

It seems to me that the future directions of education ought to be determined by a marketplace decision by those who use their services. It may be that some of these institutions will choose to initiate a lifetime learning curriculum where it will educate people into their 20's and 30's and 40's. One of those institutions now has an average age of 27 among its student body. It is a rather sizable institution, indicating that it is not catering just to the high school graduates or to blacks and the underprivileged.

Mr. Chairman, institutions catering to low-income students need the continuation of some of the present programs. We still need the basic education opportunity grant for such institutions whose clientele may not include many taxpayers. Such people cannot take advantage of the tax credits. They do not pay very much in the way of an income tax.

However, for others who are middle-income taxpayers we need this tax credit approach because they are excluded from the basic opportunity grants but still need help to finance higher education. So let us give those middle-income people the right to determine where higher education in this country is going. Without tax credits the decision will be made by Government just doling out the money for higher education institutions. Mr. Chairman, every one of those institutions is going to want the money. They will be fighting each other for the fewer available students and will try to do it with Federal funds, taken from the taxpayers' pockets by Government and then doled out as bureaucrats see fit. I would rather that institutions offer services attracting the students who want to go there and who will thus make that decision on which institutions get the money, rather than have Government decide which of the institutions survive, how the colleges should be modified, and to whom institutions should be directing their educational curriculum in the future.

Only in that marketplace decision, which is much more likely to be economic than the one Government makes, will the proper decision be made. Government decisions are political, not economic. Educational decisions ought to be made by the individual parents and students, not by Government. Government handouts threaten the traditional independence of academic freedom. The tuition tax credit protects the diversity of individual choice in education and thus retains America's tradition of academic freedom.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCEWEN).

(Mr. MCEWEN asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MCEWEN. Mr. Chairman, with all of my colleagues, I have received many letters and mailgrams on the question of tuition tax credit. Some of those opposing the measure have expressed alarm for the future of public education, a fear that I do not share. But one letter that I received contributed more than any other to my decision to support this legislation. It was written by a public school teacher, and I want to share it with my colleagues.

The letters follows:

MALONE, N.Y.,
April 11, 1978.

Representative ROBERT C. MCEWEN,
Route 2,
Ogdensburg, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: I am writing to show my support for the Moynihan-Packwood Tax Credit Bill.

Although I am a public school teacher myself, I have long been a supporter of parochial and private education. I do not feel that the Moynihan-Packwood Bill would cause the extinction of the public education system in our country as is being claimed by the bill's detractors. On the other hand, the bill will certainly aid the troubled situation that many parochial and private schools find themselves in.

One of the foundations of our democracy is that its citizens will have freedom of choice in as many vital areas as is possible. I feel that education is one of these vital areas, and that the citizens of the United States must be given alternatives to the public school system which to a large extent has gone the route of other monopolies in offering an inferior product.

The American public is told that they must educate their children until the age of 16. Yet in many communities, with the death of parochial and private education, they are given no choice on how their children are educated.

For these reasons, I strongly urge your support on the Moynihan-Packwood Tax Credit Bill. Thank you very much for your time.

Respectfully,

GEORGE WISEMAN.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I want to address just a few comments on some of the remarks that have been made on the floor.

With respect to distribution, the staff of the Joint Committee on Taxation, in the memorandum of May 23, indicated that 83 percent of the distributional benefits, if elementary and secondary students were included in this bill, would go to income classes of $30,000 or less. Under $50,000 would get 96 percent of the benefits. Obviously, this is not a bill for the wealthy.

There was also a discussion about the so-called Archer amendment, which is purported to take institutions in or out of something. The Archer amendment simply describes the actual effect of the bill. There is no money going to any schools or institutions. The money is going to parents or students, and that is exactly what is intended. The amendment does not take anybody or anything in or out.

With respect to discrimination, the junior Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN) wrote to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue asking about the IRS's ability to police the nondiscrimination features of the 501(c)3 classification. I have placed that letter and the response in the RECORD, but for the purposes of debate today, the first question asked was:

Are the provisions of the present law . . . adequate to achieve the purposes of barring tax credits for payments to private elementary or secondary schools that are racially discriminatory?

The Commissioner replied:

At this time, we do not believe there is a need for additional statutory support of the Service's position that private schools exempt under 501(c)(3) may not discriminate on racial grounds, and we do not have any suggestions for further substantive statutory rules.

As a matter of fact, with respect to discrimination, many of the nonpublic systems are full of minorities. Students in Chicago system, for instance, operated by the Archdiocese of Chicago are 78 percent black or with Spanish surnames. As a matter of fact, in that mix about 40 percent are not Catholic.

There was also discussion today about how the students themselves feel. This was in our committee, and while there was testimony on both sides, the preponderence was in favor of tuition tax credits.

One Member spoke on the floor and said that this bill, if fully funded, will cost $5.4 billion. I think the reference was to the Senate bill. Again, the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation memorandum indicates that the cost of this bill as it is before us is about $900 million when fully operational, and with the elementary and secondary schools added, a maximum of $1.2 billion.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. FENWICK. I thank my colleague for yielding. I have some questions.

I too have received information that the implementation at the post-secondary level, the cost for the first year would be $1.2 billion, as our colleague from Maryland has said, and if elementary and secondary levels are included, $5.8 billion by 1983.

Mr. FRENZEL. Those figures, I believe, refer to the Senate bill. The bill before us, at least as the estimates are presented to us by the Joint Committee on Taxation, will cost about $900 million in the third year.

Mrs. FENWICK. That is the addition involved in the Vanik amendment; is it not?

Mr. FRENZEL. The Vanik amendment will add about $300 million to the bill as it is before us.

Mrs. FENWICK. It says $354 million additional in 1980, and the bill itself would be how much?

Mr. FRENZEL. That is $900 million. The Vanik-Frenzel amendment would add $300 million. That is $1.2 billion.

Mrs. FENWICK. That is $1.2 billion. But what is the difference between this bill and the Senate bill?

Mr. FRENZEL. The Senate bill when fully operational after its 5th year, as I understand the last estimate, would be about $5.3 billion, but that bill has not been passed by the Senate but only by the Finance Committee.

Mrs. FENWICK. But nevertheless it would be $1.2 billion on this bill, and that amount for the Senate bill, as it is called.

Mr. FRENZEL. That is by 1980.

Mrs. FENWICK. I would like to ask another question. I notice the Internal Revenue Service or at least the framers of the legislation seem to indicate that giving this tax credit, which is indeed a subsidy from the Federal Government, does give the Government the right to insist on desegregation. I do not see how this would not leave a private school open to suit by those who have decided that no public money can go to a school where prayers are said, and I wonder if we will not open up that whole question again.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as remains to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LUKEN), who did an exemplary job in handling the matter of tuition credits.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LUKEN) is recognized for 6 minutes.

Mr. RONCALIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield

Mr. LUKEN. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. RONCALIO. Mr. Chairman, title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 states that anyone receiving Federal financial assistance must prove that they are not discriminating on the basis of race.

In the Ways and Means Committee, the gentleman from Texas (Congressman ARCHER) offered an amendment to H.R. 12050 to provide that tuition tax credits are not considered Federal financial assistance. This amendment passed, thus removing tuition tax credits from the purview of title VI of the Civil Rights Act.

The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights is fearful, after extensive study, that tuition tax credits for elementary and secondary schools will promote segregation by encouraging an exodus from public schools to nonpublic schools, thus setting up a new phase of segregation.

The question of whether or not tuition tax credits should be interpreted as Federal financial assistance will ultimately have to be decided by the court. In the meantime, it is our responsibility to see that we not promote segregation by enactment of the Vanik amendment as worded.

In the Vanik amendment, a provision is included which states that, to qualify for a credit, a student would have to attend a private elementary or secondary school which is State accredited or approved, and is tax exempt. In order to obtain, and maintain the tax exempt status, a school must prove that it does not discriminate on the basis of race.

However, there is dissatisfaction with the way IRS is handling the job of preventing discrimination in private schools. To illustrate this point, I submit the following:

The IRS is under a permanent Federal court injunction from granting tax-exempt status to any private school in Mississippi until it has made an affirmative determination based on objective data that the school is operated on a nondiscriminatory basis.

Despite this order, the Civil Rights Commission staff has identified seven private schools presently on the tax-exempt list, though they have been barred from receiving Mississippi State assistance under other Federal court decisions.

The above represents only one State, but it brings the realization that, by giving IRS complete authority—knowing that the IRS has not fully handled this responsibility—we could very well jeopardize all the progress that has been made in the past half-century; and it is vitally important that the legislative history show that it is not the intent of Congress that tuition tax credits be removed from the jurisdiction of the Federal Government in its responsibility to regulate the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and to insure that segregation practices do not surface anew.

Although I am inclined to support tuition tax credits for elementary and secondary students, I am very apprehensive about the present wording and the possible setback we may cause. Mr. Chairman, since we are prevented from adding amendments on the floor, this debate should make it clear that the legislative intent in the Vanik amendment is to prevent the remotest possibility of segregation by race in private schools.

Mr. LUKEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Tuition Tax Credit Act of 1978 and in support of the Vanik amendment, particularly the Vanik amendment as it applies to elementary and secondary education.

I believe that the American people are firmly committed to tax credits. I believe that this Congress has sensed that for some time. Yet there seems to be a criticism of the fact that this Congress may follow the will of the American people, criticism in the form of objections to this bill which seem to be general and rather vague: It should not be brought up; it might be divisive. And yet when the Congress did sense the will of the American people, the administration stepped in and offered an alternative, the administration's Middle-Income Student Assistance Act, which was firmly and decisively rejected by this Congress.

When the Budget Committee recommended against tuition tax credits, the Congress again said by a vote of 199 to 173 that it was in favor of the tax credits.

So these efforts to blunt the thrust and thwart the will of the Congress are continuing. I say that the people want tuition tax credits because they want the freedom of educational choice, because combined with increased taxation and inflation our parents now and our students now are denied that choice.

In many ways we now support nonpublic institutions with our tax laws, and this has been pointed out.

It has also been pointed out very clearly that it is not just the public schools that have been suffering but as a matter of fact the nonpublic schools have been dropping in enrollment and are suffering more, and so if this is passed and implemented at a fairly high level, compared to what is now suggested, we will not be favoring the nonpublic schools but we will at best be voting for the status quo. We will not be giving one the advantage over the other.

I do not believe that tax credits will be the death knell of public education. Nothing of the sort. As a matter of fact I stand with those who believe we need more recognition on both sides of the value of both school systems. This is one reason why I know in my district in Cincinnati, where the public school levies are defeated time and again and the Cincinnati public school system is in trouble, I believe we will benefit from the passage of this bill even though of a nominal amount.

I was standing in a shopping center recently after I sponsored the amendment which passed in the budget and a woman, obviously a parent, walked up to me and said, "If we get this, it will be the first thing we ever got."

That is an indication I believe that she certainly felt very strongly on this matter, and I further believe that it is an indication that there is somewhat of a seige mentality on the part of parents of nonpublic school students who have been paying for two systems and who are asking and who are pleading for some form of equity.

It has been emphasized, stated and restated that this is not some kind of relief for the rich. The overwhelming number of nonpublic school parents are of middle income or lower income families. I myself have had my own children in both private and public school systems and can testify that in Cincinnati the nonpublic school system is at least as integrated as is the public school system, probably more so. So I do not believe it will foster racial segregation. It may in individual cases, but that always is the case. But I believe the evidence is quite to the contrary.

So, Mr. Chairman, I believe that the House has made full room for a full tuition tax credit in the 1979 budget, as it has been indicated, and I hope the Members will vote similarly in support of the Vanik amendments.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUKEN. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Ohio Mr. LUKEN for yielding to me.

I would ask the gentleman, would he assume that as more children go to private schools there will be less taxpayer's support for funds for the public school systems, bond issues and so forth, would that not be a logical assumption, that as this increased number of children go to the private schools that it will ultimately decrease support for the public schools? Is that not a logical assumption?

Mr. LUKEN. Let me say that there still will be a substantial amount of sacrifice that will be involved. That is an important point that I forgot to mention in my remarks here. There will still be a substantial amount of sacrifice. There will not be a significant change in the overall proportion of students attending either nonpublic or public schools.

As I stated earlier, it is my firm belief that if this equity is extended that the passage of public school levies will be enhanced.

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, today we are considering a bill of great importance to American taxpayers. This bill provides a tax credit for up to 25 percent of college or postsecondary vocational school tuition, up to a ceiling of $100 in 1978, $150 in 1979, and $250 in 1980. I am a cosponsor of the original tuition tax credit legislation introduced by Congressman BURKE and Congressman FRENZEL and plan to vote for this measure today.

Because this is such an important—and emotionally charged issue on both sides—I would like to briefly summarize my reasons for supporting this bill and the Vanik amendment to extend the tax credit to elementary and secondary school tuition.

The idea of tax credits for tuition is not new, but I believe the need for this legislation is even greater now than when it was originally proposed.

Education at every level is facing a crisis caused in great part by the rise in tuition. For all but the wealthiest Americans, it is increasingly more difficult for parents to finance the education they want for their children. The squeeze of inflation and higher taxes is making it especially hard for the middle-income worker who is too poor to afford the cost but too well off to qualify for Federal financial assistance. Taxpayers are reaching the end of their ropes—they need some relief. I am afraid that without this kind of assistance we may see a drastic cutback in private school enrollment. This will be reflected in crowding some public schools which will increase the tax liability for their support. It will jeopardize the pluralism of our educational system and it will further alienate these most alienated of middle-income workers.

The middle-income workers, who pick up the tab for most of the costs of Government including the programs to assist the poor, generally do not benefit from any Government programs. Middle-income Americans usually cannot afford to take advantage of Government tax incentives such as tax-free municipal bonds, and cannot use tax deductions for charitable contributions—including those to religious institutions—which are available to those taxpayers who itemize their tax returns. It has always seemed grossly unfair to me that wealthy people should be permitted this advantage, while middle- and low-income people get no charitable incentive. Indeed, perhaps the best resolution of this problem is a bill which I introduced to provide a small charitable tax credit.

Furthermore, tax credits currently are provided for expenses in a number of areas of national concern such as for the expenses of child care, retirement, work incentives, and investment income. Certainly, education expenses equally deserve this kind of support and tax treatment. I believe there are few areas where a tax break is more appropriate and would help the recipient more directly than a tax credit for tuition.

During the past few months, I have talked to a great number of people regarding this issue and reviewed the materials being circulated by groups and interested individuals. To date, I have seen nothing in the way of studies or statistics which would lead me to believe this bill would have the drastic effect on public education that tax credit opponent predict. The proposed tax credit will not begin to pay a major part of education expenses, but it will provide some desperately needed assistance for taxpayers. For many of them even a small tax credit will make a big difference, they are so hard pressed. I honestly do not feel that this credit is enough incentive to encourage parents to change their educational lifestyles and no longer take advantage of a "free" education.

I recognize that there are honest differences of opinion on this issue among people who share with me a deep concern for the future of public education in our country. However, I still feel this is primarily a tax relief measure to aid the taxpayers of this country, and it answers a real and legitimate need of millions of Americans. I do not consider this tax credit in any way inconsistent with other Federal aid to education. I have supported every single aid to education program since I came to Congress and will certainly support and actively advocate large increases in aid to public education in the future. I think our goal should be Federal payment of one-third to one-half the costs of public education, most of it as revenue sharing with no strings attached.

Finally, I do not believe this tax credit legislation precludes our consideration of other measures to help parents and students meet their education expenses, nor do I believe this should be the major initiative in the financing of education. I would like to see our present student financial aid programs expanded and their administration improved. Also, I believe we should carefully consider the proposal drafted by the president of Boston University, John Silber, and introduced by Representative MICHAEL HARRINGTON. This bill establishes a Federal tuition advance fund to advance students the full amount of their college tuition, and as much as $1,000 toward room and board, up to a total of $5,000 annually. Students would repay this money on a gradual basis, depending on their income, over most of their working lifetime.

In conclusion, I believe we need to consider many options to insure that money does not prevent anyone from receiving the education they want and need, and tax credits should be one part of our Federal education assistance program.●

● Mr. LE FANTE. Mr. Chairman, I am pleased that we have the opportunity today to debate and vote on a bill which focuses the attention of the Congress upon the difficulties facing many middle-income Americans in educating their children. I have long been concerned about the increasing cost of education and its burdensome effect on middle- and low-income families. When I campaigned for Congress, and previously in my capacity as a State legislator, I made a commitment to finding and supporting ways to ease the growing financial burden on the middle-income taxpayer. I am still firmly committed to that goal and, in fact, the first piece of legislation I introduced in Congress was a bill to provide a tax credit for postsecondary education expenses. I support H.R. 12050, the Tuition Tax Credit Act of 1978 for the same reasons I introduced my tax credit bill, H.R. 14.

The Tuition Tax Credit Act provides a nonrefundable Federal income tax credit against tuition that taxpayers pay for themselvse, their spouse, or dependents to attend postsecondary educational institutions. The tax credit would equal 25 percent of the tuition paid by a taxpaper, up to a maximum credit of $100 in 1978, $150 in 1979, and $250 in 1980 for each eligible student. The credit would become effective August 1, 1978, and terminate after December 31, 1980.

I believe tuition tax credits are a simple, direct, and effective way to help families who are faced with today's rapidly increasing college tuition costs. As both taxes and the cost of tuition continue to rise, there is the fear that children from middle-income families will be squeezed out of getting a college education since these two factors will leave their families with less disposable income to pay for their higher education expenses. The Tuition Tax Credit Act will provide some finanical relief to hard-pressed students and families who must bear the ever-increasing costs of pursuing a higher education.

While I support the bill reported out by the Ways and Means Committee, I do not believe it goes far enough in easing the financial burden of many low- and middle-income families since the bill does not include elementary and secondary school tuition tax credits. I consider this exclusion to be an oversight on the part of the committee. Tax relief in this bill should also be extended to parents who pay tuition for their children to attend nonpublic elementary and secondary schools.

I know this is a matter of great concern to the many families in my district whose children attend nonpublic elementary and secondary schools. I have heard from an overwhelming number of my constituents who support providing tax credits for tuition for these nonpublic schools. In fact, my office has received more mail in support of this provision than on any other issue since I have been in Congress.

I support the Vanik-Frenzel amendment to extend the tax credit to parents who pay tuition for their children to attend nonpublic elementary and secondary schools. This amendment would limit the credit to a percent of the tuition actually paid to a maximum of $50 in 1978 and $100 in 1979 and 1980.

Extending the tuition tax credit to these families is justifiable for several reasons. Tuition costs have skyrocketed at all levels of education, not only at the postsecondary level. The costs of nonpublic elementary and secondary education have risen substantially in recent years and are expected to continue to rise. Low- and middle-income families whose children attend nonpublic elementary and secondary schools are faced with a genuine financial burden, which has been referred to as "double taxation." Not only are they paying nonpublic school tuition costs, they are also paying taxes to support the public school system. Providing tuition tax credits to these families will to some extent relieve the low- and middle-income taxpayer of that burden.

Extending tax allowances for nonpublic elementary and secondary school tuition charges also works to maintain the diversity in our educational system by providing an alternative to the public school system. This diversity allows lower- and middle-income families the opportunity to exercise some choice in educating their children and permits parents to maintain and strengthen their family's ethnic and religious ties.

My record shows that I have been a strong and constant supporter of our public education system. What I am advocating here in supporting the Vanik-Frenzel amendment is freedom of choice—and that means choice for people in all income brackets, not just the rich. Lower- and middle-income families need help if private education is going to be accessible and affordable for their children. A tuition tax credit would provide at least some financial relief for these families who are struggling with the high cost of educating their children.●

Mr. LEGGETT. Mr. Chairman, we have had the opportunity this afternoon to listen to many compelling and thoughtful arguments in support of H.R. 12050, the Tuition Tax Credit Act of 1978.

Surely no one can doubt that Congress stands firm in the conviction that we as a Nation can make no more sound an investment than in the continued support of our educational system.

All of us are painfully aware that the cost of a college education is rapidly escalating beyond the means of many Americans. The College Entrance Examination Board reports that between the 1970–71 and 1976–77 school years, the average tuition and fees for 4-year colleges rose at 54 percent at private institutions and 57 percent at public institutions. The current programs of financial assistance for college students and their families do not provide enough help. Clearly, it is time to reconsider our approach.

Many of my colleagues have praised tuition tax credits as a simple, direct, and effective way to help families faced with skyrocketing college tuition costs. Nothing could be further from the truth.

The proposal before us today falls woefully short of meeting the basic needs of families trying to put their children through college. The tuition tax credit would be inefficiently distributed and would fail to provide middle-income families with the assistance they need at the time they need it. Furthermore, it would substantially increase taxpayer paperwork and would fragment our national education policy.

A close examination of this misguided proposal reveals that tuition tax credits would not be targeted at those families most in need. The bill provides a maximum credit of $250 to families regardless of their income levels. The Joint Committee on Taxation estimates that nearly one-third of the benefits will go to families with incomes in excess of $30,000 annually, with a paltry 9 percent of the benefits going to those families with incomes of $10,000 or less. Obviously, these families needing financial assistance the most would get the least.

We have over the years attempted to equalize educational opportunity by directing postsecondary educational assistance to those families and students with minimum resources, providing an educational opportunity otherwise unavailable. The tuition tax credit proposal is a large step backward in achieving this goal.

I share the concern expressed by many of my colleagues that middle-income families need more help. But we should be certain that we are providing them with meaningful relief.

This student assistance proposal comes to us not after long deliberation in the Committee on Education and Labor, but from the Ways and Means Committee. The specter of placing one area of educational policy into the tax-writing area and out of the committee with educational expertise is, indeed, a dangerous precedent.

To the extent that middle-income families need more help, far more money would go to them under H.R. 11274, the Middle-Income Student Assistance Act. Unfortunately, this proposal is not before us this afternoon. I would like to note, however, that H.R. 11274 would require appropriations of only $1.4 billion, as opposed to an estimated revenue reduction of $5.3 billion under the tuition tax proposal. The student aid bill, H.R. 11274, would greatly expand student aid for families with incomes up to $25,000. The proposal before us today, however, would have no impact on student aid. And, it would offer pathetically little help to needy parents hoping to give their children the chance they never had.

During their consideration of H.R. 12050, the Ways and Means Committee wisely voted to eliminate elementary and secondary school tuitions from eligibility for the tax credit. The case against elementary and secondary credits includes serious dangers to our existing public school systems and undue involvement by the Federal Government in support of religion and religious institutions. Furthermore, the Attorney General has stated that in his opinion, tax credits for elementary and secondary school students would be held unconstitutional. If we were to adopt such a credit, it would no doubt be held up in litigation for years. This is a Pandora's box I would rather not open, and ask that you vote with me in rejecting the Vanik-Frenzel amendment which would restore these tax credits.

H.R. 12050 is opposed by the administration, the AFL–CIO, the Public Citizen's Tax Reform Group, the American Federation of Teachers, the National Education Association, the National Student Association, the National Student Lobby, the National Congress of Parents, the National Council of Churches, and the League of Women Voters, to name just a few.

I am pleased, however, that the tuition tax credit proposal has finally focused our attention upon the difficulties faced by most middle-class Americans in educating their children. It is my hope that the momentum generated by this proposal will allow a more realistic approach, like that of H.R. 11274, the Middle-Income Student Assistance Act, to come to the floor before the end of the 95th Congress. But to underscore what I stated earlier, a careful examination of this tax credit proposal reveals it to be a hoax on the middle-class taxpayer, unnecessarily expensive, and inflationary—without making it any easier for a student to get an education. I urge you to join with me in voting to reject this most unwise and ineffective tax scheme.

Mr. PURSELL. Mr. Chairman, today, after years of debate, we are finally considering the issue of tuition tax credits. I, for one, am pleased that this legislation is before us because I believe that it will relieve at least part of the strain which rising college tuition costs impose on all American families—including the middle-income families. Furthermore, I believe that this tax credit is really an investment for the future of the United States. With the rapidly rising costs of college education, this small measure of tax relief will make it easier for our students to attend college and graduate, thereby making a more productive America for all of us.

My congressional district contains the largest student population—over 84,000—in the United States, so I am well aware of the financial burdens incurred by students and their families. I am proud to say that I had the pleasure of hearing one of my student constituents—the president of the University of Michigan student body—and a representative from Michigan State University, testify before the Ways and Means Committee on the tuition tax credit issue.

The facts of the matter are that from 1967 to 1976 the overall cost of a private college education rose 99 percent, while costs for attending a public university increased by 93 percent. At the same time, it turns out that whereas the median before tax income of families with 18 to 24-year-old dependents rose 78.8 percent between 1967 and 1976, the corresponding after tax income increased just 66.8 percent. I think these figures show—beyond any doubt—that it has become increasingly difficult for the average family to send their children to college.

I do not believe anyone in this Congress can deny that relief for college tuition costs is necessary. Without educated young people, this country will lose an important resource.

However, when it comes to the question of elementary and secondary tuition tax credits, we enter a much different phase of the discussion. As I have done in the past, I support scholarship funds, transportation funds and recent court decisions regarding textbooks, for private schools. I do not believe we should attempt to correct what is really a very basic problem dealing with financing, with a tax credit system.

We should be addressing the root of the problems regarding elementary and secondary financing by reviewing the total system, including the increasingly high property taxes homeowners in America are experiencing. In the Michigan State Senate, I sponsored a constitutional amendment to reduce our property tax in Michigan by 50 percent, to help ease the tax burden of all homeowners but with a tax adjustment in the income tax to replace it. Here in the House of Representatives, I have introduced a comprehensive bill to create a Department of Education—and this is the only such bill which deals with the issue of elementary and secondary education financing. My bill sets up a Commission on School Financing to analyze and recommend a comprehensive plan to correct the inequities and problems which we face in this matter.

It is my firm belief that such an approach—not tuition tax credits—is the way to deal with this tremendous problem. Such an alternative would deal with the disease, and not just the symptoms.

Therefore, I lend my support to tuition tax credits for postsecondary education, and urge my colleagues to deal with the vast problems of elementary and secondary educational financing in a more equitable manner.

● Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, to many middle-income Americans with children in college, the tuition tax credit legislation before us today, H.R. 12050, is one of the most important tax measures to come before the 95th Congress. It will provide middle-income families with badly needed relief against the skyrocketing costs of higher education. Importantly, it will do so without putting undue pressures on the Federal deficit or inflation. As it presently stands, I can support H.R. 12050 and think it is a well-balanced and reasonable bill.

RELIEF NEEDED NOW

Clearly, many families in the middle-income brackets are hard pressed to meet the costs of higher education. In the last 5 years, the average cost of obtaining an education at a public institution of higher learning has risen more than 40 percent, while the cost of an education in a private college has increased more than 36 percent during the same period. Moreover, a recent survey shows that college attendance of children from middle-income families is on the decline—down 22 percent in the early seventies—while the attendance of children from lower and upper income families has remained stable.

In recent months, I have received hundreds of letters like this one:

I'm tired of getting it from both sides. My income negates any consideration for aid, although I've had two children in college for the last three years. At the same time, by working harder to pay their way, I'm in a higher tax bracket.

In my opinion, the present trends in education costs and mounting tax burdens threaten to make a higher education prohibitive for many middle-income families. I believe a tuition tax credit for higher education is essential to keep the doors of higher learning open to all Americans.

POSTSECONDARY CREDIT FIRST PRIORITY

For 3 years now I have sponsored legislation, H.R. 6748, to provide tuition tax credits for higher education. Like my bill, H.R. 12050 will cover the broad spectrum of postsecondary institutions—both vocational and academic—and take some of the burden off families who have faced not only higher tuition costs, but rapidly rising tax assessments in recent years. I think that middle-income families have already waited too long for this sort of tax relief.

An amendment will be offered to provide a tax credit for families with children in private elementary and secondary schools. While I am very sympathetic to the plight of such families, I cannot support the amendment at this time because it would dramatically cut into already stretched Federal revenues. The Joint Committee on Taxation estimates that the amendment would take $1.8 billion out of the Federal budget over the next 4 years.

Three weeks ago the House approved a 1979 budget that I opposed because it would create a $57.9 billion Federal deficit and lead to higher inflation in consumer prices. Until we cut the deficit, bring Federal spending under control, and begin a real attack on inflation, I cannot support measures that continue to deplete Federal revenues.

When the House considered the 1979 Federal budget, I offered a plan that would cut the deficit by 50 percent. I believe my plan—pruning wasteful spending, foregoing an additional $10.7 billion tax cut, eliminating corporate tax loopholes and relaxing Federal monetary policies—would make a real dent in inflation.

The diversity of this Nation made it great. We must continue to foster plurality and choice in our educational system. The Federal Government does this in part by making private elementary and secondary students eligible for many forms of Federal assistance like their public school counterparts.

I, too, am concerned about the high costs facing private and public schools, but believe our first step must be to put a halt to inflation. Our schools, like our citizens, have faced a 39-percent increase in electricity in the last 5 years; they are coping with an almost doubling of gasoline prices in the last 4 years. The American Library Association has told me that the cost of children's library books has risen 45 percent since 1971. Food prices for school lunches, teacher's wages, health and retirement benefits for school personnel are all escalating. Quite simply, the fight against inflation is the fight we must wage to help schools pay their bills and provide education for all our children.

There are many methods of financing education. We must maintain a mix and diversity. And importantly, we must keep our children's education at the top of our priorities.●

● Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the bill (H.R. 12050) to provide for tuition tax credits and in support of the amendments offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK).

As a member of the Committee on Rules, I have supported every effort to bring this measure up for a vote in the House and I commend the leadership for scheduling this measure in adequate time to send the bill to the President before the end of this session.

Mr. Chairman, I know that many of my colleagues are concerned about the effect of the Vanik amendment on our public schools. I am sympathetic to their position and share their commitment to public education. However, I do not believe that the Vanik amendment poses any danger and urge its adoption.

As a Representative from the Boston area, I am particularly eager to provide some relief to parents in my district who send their children to private schools.

Boston has one of the largest parochial school systems in the United States. The system has worked well and has maintained a useful and constructive diversity in our community. It has also helped to hold down property taxes. If the financial strains forced the parochial school system to curtail enrollment, the impact on Boston taxpayers would be disastrous. This legislation will not solve the crushing property taxes in Boston nor will it deal with the financial burden of the nonpublic schools.

But it will provide relief to hard-pressed taxpayers who, in many cases, must pay taxes to support public schools while paying the cost of sending their own children to nonpublic schools.

It must be recognized that the passage of this bill represents a significant protest by the people and their representatives against the bureaucratic indignities suffered by applicants for existing Federal programs.

To apply for the BEOG program, for example, a student and his parents must complete a complicated and exhausting form. They will be required to furnish a lot of information that is necessary to determine eligibility and a lot of other information which is not needed but satisfies the curiosity of HEW.

If they have made no mistakes and have no special circumstances (which must be explained in a separate box nobody reads) they will get back a form saying they are eligible and how much they will receive. If they have made any kind of error, they will get a form that sometime requires them to start from scratch. Each step takes months and is handled entirely by computers so no information can be obtained during processing. At the end, the student is faced with a form that tells him he will receive $20, $100, $1,000 or whatever with no idea how the figure was arrived at, whether it is fair, or even correct.

I am voting for this bill today because my constituents have had enough. They want a program that is simple, understandable and reliable.

For this reason, I am voting against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA). The Mikva amendment is a fair and useful suggestion. However, it is far too complicated and could move us back toward the frustration which led our constituents to demand that Congress act on a tuition tax credit.

Mr. Chairman, this is vitually necessary legislation and I urge its adoption.●

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the Tuition Tax Credit Act and the proposed amendment to include elementary and secondary tuition costs. I spoke on this subject in length and in detail during the consideration of the new tax credit amendment to the budget resolution, and I shall not take up my colleague's time now except to briefly summarize what I believe are the major issues involved.

I do not believe support of tax credits can be equated to nonsupport of public education. It is not the public schools which are loosing students because of inflation and I have seen absolutely nothing in the way of surveys or statistics to indicate that there will be a mass exodus from the public schools with the passage of this bill.

I have heard it said that this bill will be some kind of a windfall for the rich—well, if $250 represents a windfall to someone who is considered wealthy, then all I can say is our economy is in worse shape than anyone imagined. I say this $250 represents nothing more than a recognition that tuition costs are as legitimate and allowable an expense as, say, interest payments. Besides, no matter what rhetoric we have heard today, the fact is that those who will benefit most will be the middle-class taxpayer—remember him? He is the one who has been picking up the tab for all the other educational help programs his kids cannot participate in.

I have also heard it said that the bill is unconstitutional. I realize this is a debatable question, and while I believe this is no more unconstitutional than tax deductions for contributions to churches, I say let us give it a try and let the Supreme Court decide the issue.

Finally, I believe the crux of this whole issue is freedom of choice in education because with the financial pressure created by high taxes and runaway inflation, the only people who will be able to afford a choice will be the rich. I say, let us give the folks who have been working so hard to pay the enormous bill of Government a small break. Let us let these folks keep a tiny bit more of what is theirs in the first place. I urge my colleagues to support this bill and the Vanik amendment for elementary and secondary education.●

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I am of course pleased that the House is moving toward the adoption of a tuition credit. My colleague, the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL), did a tremendous work in the committee in preparing and advocating the approval of the legislation.

However, the principal credit for the progress of this legislation must be given to the distinguished gentleman from New York, Chairman JIM DELANEY of the House Rules Committee. No Member of the Congress has worked harder or longer to bring us to this point. He has supported this idea for almost 30 years.

If this bill is signed into law and hope that the President will sign the final product, the bill will be a monument to the high purpose and the consistent leadership of the gentleman from New York, JIM DELANEY.

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Chairman, there are few issues, I feel certain, that will be more difficult for me, more keenly felt by my constituents, more hotly debated both within and outside this body than the issue of tuition tax credits. The controversy—and passion—surrounding this bill has certainly given me a good lesson in the careful thought and consideration every issue before this body must be given. And it is after that kind of thought, and after listening to well-considered arguments on each and all sides of this issue that I today rise in support of Mr. VANIK's amendment to this bill to provide tuition tax credits for the families of children attending private schools.

Mr. Chairman, I am doing this to help the parents of children in my district. Yes, even in the south Bronx, I am convinced that the proportion of minorities in the public and private schools is comparable. And I deeply believe that even—no, particularly—in areas such as mine, people must have access to alternatives in education at the most basic level. No, in my district there is no segregation in the private schools, for they are filled with the children of parents who see a private education as a way to create a brighter future for their kids.

Tuition tax credits are not just for the middle and upper class, and I reject those arguments that imply they will not help those who need it. They seek to help lower income families—people who must adjust their own financial difficulties to their children's educational needs. If aid is not provided during the years when children are in elementary and secondary school, many of the most capable and deserving will not have the option of competing for postsecondary tax credits—or any other form of college assistance, for that matter—and I think that is clearly exclusionary and discriminatory against the more needy children in our society. Let Secretary Califano and the U.S. Catholic Conference debate how much money private schools receive. Our primary concern should be the educational opportunities available to the children.

Support of private education does not mean no support for public education.

And I have supported the concept of aid to private education since my days in the New York legislature. Support of tuition tax credits will not mean the end of public education, but it does mean that we are prepared to guarantee a child's educational opportunities when the public schools have failed. You may be certain that I will continue to be as diligent in my support of public education, and of improving the quality of education our children receive in all institutions.●

Mr. STOCKMAN. Mr. Chairman, the mounting tax burden on middle-class citizens has come to pose a serious threat to the future of educational freedom of choice in our country. This increasing strain on the financial resources of most Americans has made the prospect of a college education for our children less certain, and has further weakened the private elementary and secondary education system, which provides an invaluable supplement to our public schools. For these reasons, I urge my colleagues to support the tuition tax credit proposal before the House.

It is true that tuition costs have increased tremendously over the past 5 years. The problem, however, is not the high cost of education relative to a family's wages. Rather, it is cost as a percentage of after-tax take-home pay that is crucial. Tuition costs have gone up by more than 50 percent in the last 5 years. During the same time, prices in the economy generally have risen nearly 36 percent. But the median gross income of families with college-age dependents has increased by more than 40 percent. Why, then, has the cost of education become such a financial burden on the average American family?

The answer is to be found in the fact that gains in before-tax wages have not compensated for the much greater increases in taxes. Over the past 5 years, taxes have risen twice as fast as the cost of living generally. The result is that the average family has considerably less money left over on payday for education than would be true had taxes remained steady.

Rising prices, high tuition costs, and much higher taxes have thus combined to squeeze the typical family's budget. On top of all this, the tandem of unchecked inflation and compensating wage hikes has moved many taxpayers into higher marginal tax rate brackets, where an even greater percentage of income disappears into government coffers.

Ideally, if the Congress were to look beyond the immediate problem and reform our entire tax structure to provide relief across the board, American families would have greater after-tax income available for such purposes as education. Until this more basic reform can be addressed, however, we should adopt the proposed tuition tax credit plan.

Many middle-income parents justifiably fear that, when the time comes, they either will be unable to afford to give their children a college education, or will have to make extraordinary sacrifices to do so. Similar problems face families who have children in nonpublic elementary and secondary schools. Here, parents are confronted with a double burden. Not only must they pay tuition, but they are also subjected to the rising property taxes used to finance the public school system. The result is that fewer and fewer families are able to exercise their free choice to send their children to private schools. U.S. Commerce Department statistics indicate that private elementary schools have lost 20 percent of their enrollment in the last 10 years.

As a practical matter, I believe we must recognize the added burden that reduced private school enrollment would impose on our public school system. Some 7.7 million students now enrolled in private educational institutions would have to be absorbed by tax-supported schools at an estimated additional cost of $17 billion per year.

The fear that a tuition tax credit will make private education more competitive and that it will attract too many students to private schools to the detriment of the public schools is therefore unwarranted. Indeed, the foregoing statistics indicate that the tax credit alone may prove insufficient to preserve the private education alternative we presently possess.

In my view, we will suffer a tremendous loss if we allow the demise of our private schools to continue unabated. The opportunity for private education provides a highly desirable alternative for those families who wish to meet particular needs in the education of their children. Freedom of choice in education must be recognized as essential to the preservation of our larger political freedoms.

Unlike our present Federal student aid programs, which consist largely of direct grants and insured loans, the tax credit will not stimulate further growth of an inefficient and costly administrative mechanism. The student assistance bureaucracy is already laden with serious problems, ranging from the massive volume of routine paperwork to the increasing demands of policing student defaults. As the amount of student aid has risen, the administrative structure has increased at every level, from Federal departments down to administering schools.

The cost of administering a tax credit via existing Internal Revenue procedures is, conversely, minute in comparison to our existing aid programs in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Providing for expanded direct assistance in the form of grants and loans would only compound this expense, and, more importantly, would do nothing whatsoever to assist families with children attending private elementary and secondary schools. Administration costs came to approximately $100 million in 1977. With this sum, we could have provided $500 tax credits for 200,0000 families, money that would have gone directly for financial relief, instead of for paperwork.

It is apparent, then, that the tuition tax credit would ease the present financial demand on middle income families. According to the Bureau of the Census, 32 percent of all college and university students come from families earning less than $15,000; 79 percent come from families making under $30,000. Among private elementary and secondary students, more than 71 percent are from families who earn under $25,000. The Joint Committee on Taxation estimates that 85 percent of the total benefit to be derived from the tax credit will accrue to families with adjusted gross incomes under $30,000. And because the credit will be available to all families, it will provide substantial tax relief regardless of whether parents opt for private or public colleges.

In conclusion, the purpose of the tuition tax credit proposal is to assist families in exercising their freedom of choice to satisfy their educational needs in a cost-effective manner. This approach preserves the private education alternative, while insuring against excessive pressures on our public school system. At the same time, it eliminates the prospect of more bureaucracy, more invasion of financial privacy, and more expense for the American taxpayer. I urge my colleagues to join me in giving their full support to the tuition tax credit.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Mr. Chairman, I support H.R. 12050, the Tuition Tax Credit Act of 1978, and the Vanik amendment to extend tuition tax credits for elementary and secondary schools. Having introduced and cosponsored various legislative proposals to accomplish this goal ever since coming to Congress in 1963, I am delighted that the House finally has an opportunity to do something meaningful to assist taxpayers in meeting the costs of education.

I firmly believe that the tuition tax credit approach represents the most equitable and effective way of relieving the tremendous financial burden now experienced by parents of children attending nonpublic elementary and secondary schools, and those attending both public and nonpublic postsecondary institutions. H.R. 12050 in its original form provides valuable assistance to those attending our public and private postsecondary institutions.

However, I think the Vanik amendment is a necessary component of this legislation. The amendment will help insure the continuance of private and parochial schools in the United States. These schools are worth saving not only because of their contribution to diversity in our educational system, but because of the critically important competition they provide to the public school system. This is not to suggest that public schools should or will be undermined by tuition tax credits. Rather, I think the facts indicate that public school enrollment has been and will continue to increase along with increases in Federal spending for education.

However, private schools do provide a yardstick against which to measure the quality and performance of public schools while offering an alternative approach to educational disciplines. The U.S. Commissioner of Education in fact stated in 1977 that—

> Private education is absolutely crucial to the vitality of this Nation, and public policy should strengthen rather than diminish these essential institutions.

Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have an opportunity to cast a favorable vote on this legislation and the Vanik amendment not only because of my longstanding support for the concept but also because a large majority of my constituents according to my recent annual questionnaire also support tuition tax credits. The question asked was: Which of the following approaches to increasing aid for private and postsecondary education do you prefer?

First. Federal income tax credits for a portion of tuition.

Second. Expansion of existing Federal aid programs to students.

Income tax credits were preferred by 66 percent of the respondents, while 34 percent favored expansion of existing Federal aid programs. Although both approaches are designed to improve the quality of education and provide financial relief for parents who pay tuition, I think the tax credit approach is more effective and certainly less complicated. Tax credits offer a more direct form of assistance due to the minimizing of the bureaucratic involvement. At a time when middle-income families are finding themselves hard pressed to cope with inflation, and yet excluded from a variety of Federal assistance programs, tuition tax credits represent a means for the Federal Government to provide some meaningful relief.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, this legislation has come to be viewed by some as a battle between the private and public schools. Nothing could be further from the truth, as H.R. 12050 will provide needed assistance to a great many of my constituents and those in other States who are faced with the expense of higher education either in vocational schools or our State university system. The public schools at the postsecondary level, therefore, benefit as well.

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Chairman, many myths have surrounded the issue of the tuition tax credit, and many arguments, both in favor of and in opposition to this credit have been vocalized throughout the last several months. Most every Representative, I am certain, has met with numerous teacher groups, parent groups, school board associations, and others concerned about the effects that a tuition tax credit would have upon the systems of public and private education. Without those arguments, the intricacies and subtleties of each point of view would have remained unnoticed, and I am grateful for having had the counsel of each of the groups having an interest in passage or defeat of this legislation.

The most disheartening aspect of the debate on this issue is the numerous myths and fallacies which have grown up around the concept of the tuition tax credit. Myths have been perpetuated on both sides of the fence, and in many instances, one is unable to distinguish fact from fiction.

After studying this issue carefully, I am prepared to respond to some of the most often stated arguments in opposition to the tax credit and to argue in favor of the tax credit for tuition costs.

Arguments against tuition tax credit range from its unconstitutionality to the fact that the upper middle class will be benefiting from the credit. In addition, proponents of the tax credit claim that their right to choose between public and private schools must be protected by legislation. Let me address some of the most harmful and divisive myths which have been handed down as fact.

In voting for the tuition tax credit, and for the reinstatement of the elementary and secondary school provision of the original legislation, I am voting for a simple tax break for the middle class the people most sorely in need of a tax break are the middle class and today that middle class is composed of individuals earning between $15,000 and $35,000 per year. This is a majority of Americans. The middle class, or middle-income earners have borne the burdens of escalating property taxes, rising utility bills, substantial increases in food and housing costs, and nearly a doubling of education costs within the last decade. Middle America is being squeezed so tightly now that in California, for example, a full-fledged "taxpayers revolt" is taking place. The one essential fact in all this is that the middle-income families need a break. An educational tax credit will be a step in the right direction.

Those who choose to send their children to private schools are indeed, exercising their freedom of choice in educational matters. This right has been granted by the Constitution, but the Constitution does not require that private schools, religious groups or religiously affiliated organizations should be directly subsidized by the Government. Subsidization is wrong. That is why a tax credit given to individuals is the more appropriate route. Tax credits have been proposed for insulating one's house to conserve energy, making modifications in housing to accommodate disabilities and in many instances for enabling individual to enjoy relief from overburdening taxes. These credits are for important objectives and education is one or our most important commodities. However, the costs of higher education are becoming prohibitive. Twenty years ago, it was not essential to have a college degree to obtain a good job. At other times in our history, undergraduate and graduate degrees were considered a luxury to be enjoyed by the wealthy and by those who could afford the time and expenses that education demanded. Today, however, with the premium on education being very high, it is essential that job applicants be educated at a basic level, and that basic level today is college.

There has been no pronouncement by the Supreme Court that a federally mandated tax credit for tuition is unconstitutional. The Court has been traditionally reluctant to overturn a congressionally mandated program because the broad spectrum that the Congress encompasses represents well thought out and generally nondiscriminatory courses of action. It is true that on several occasions, the Supreme Court has ruled against States which have proposed direct aid to religiously affiliated institutions because the States in question had encouraged the subsidization of their sectarian school systems. If the Congress passes the tuition tax credit legislation, which is aid to individuals and not to institutions, designed to eliminate the burdens on America's middle class, the Supreme Court will consider this action as mandate, and not as sectarian subsidy. To anticipate that the Supreme Court will declare this tax credit as unconstitutional even before the passage of this legislation is to undermine the wisdom and direction of that Court.

Administrative costs of the proposed tax credit program have been brought under question by its opponents. The cost, I understand will be minimal, as it is only necessary to modify the tax forms. The burden of proof will be on the taxpayer himself as he must provide the Government with the necessary documents and figures to become eligible for the credit.

The most pervasive argument against the tuition tax credit is that the future of the public school system will be eroded and threatened. While I am sympathetic to the plight of our Nation's public education system, I can say, in good conscience, that the Congress has been consistently generous in allocating moneys for educational programs and in insuring that our youth and adults are receiving as fine an education as is possible. Certainly, the Government has imposed some new burdens upon the public school system with the institution of a new handicapped education law and with some of the paperwork accompanying the civil right programs, but the Congress is aware of those problems and is working toward their elimination.

One of the most favorable aspects of this legislation as it was reported out of the Ways and Means Committee is one which assures that the program of tuition tax credits will be properly reviewed to insure its effectiveness, and the program has been authorized for a period of 3 years only.

The private education system has attracted only 9 percent of school age population, and certainly this percentage of students has not grown significantly within the last decade. A tax credit will not encourage parents to pull their children out of the public school system as a parent is still liable for more than 50 percent of tuition costs for each child if the tax credit is granted. A pluralized educational system has been one of the priorities and attractions of our Nation's educational programs and to invalidate this pluralism by denying any relief from educational costs is to negate this pluralism.

At this time in our history when the middle class is being unfairly imposed upon by rising costs it is essential to guarantee the right to a good education. This right is being denied to many of our citizens because of prohibitive costs. I believe that the Congress should act to reduce the taxes for the middle class, and the proposed tuition tax credit will help. The individuals who have chosen to send their children to private schools are paying property taxes to subsidize the public school educations of many other students, and are receiving no benefits from this subsidy. Tuition tax credits are not being granted to encourage a rise in enrollment in one type of school, nor should they be perceived as such.

In closing, I would urge my colleagues to keep an open mind as to the possibilities for relief for many of our middle income families, and would urge that some kind of visible relief be granted the parents of students, and the students themselves.●

QUORUM CALL VACATED

The CHAIRMAN. One hundred Members have appeared. A quorum of the Committee of the Whole is present. Pursuant to clause 2, rule XXIII, further proceedings under the call shall be considered as vacated.

The Committee will resume its business.

The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) is recognized for 5 minutes in support of his amendment.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I offer and which my colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) on the other side cosponsors, would extend the credit to private, nonprofit elementary and secondary school tuition. In order to be eligible for the credit these schools must qualify as tax exempt organizations and, therefore, cannot discriminate on the basis of race. The bill specifically provides that such schools must be ones which admit students without regard to race.

The credit would be provided for tuition paid to institutions for physically, mentally, and emotionally handicapped children. No credit would be allowed for kindergarten, nursery school, or other education below the first-grade level.

The maximum credit would be $50 in calendar year 1978; $100 in calendar years 1979 and 1980.

The cost of a 25-percent elementary and secondary credit would be for fiscal year 1978, $9 million.

For fiscal year 1979, $218 million.

For fiscal year 1980, $354 million.

For fiscal year 1981, $310 million.

The total cost of the bill with a 25-percent elementary and secondary and postsecondary credit would be for fiscal year 1978, $25 million.

For fiscal year 1979, $635 million.

For fiscal year 1980, $1,134 million.

For fiscal year 1981, $1,206 million.

If the credit is increased to 50 percent, as I hope it will be by a subsequent amendment, the elementary and secondary credit would cost for fiscal year 1978, $11 million.

For fiscal year 1979, $285 million.

For fiscal year 1980, $461 million.

For fiscal year 1981, $394 million.

The total cost of a 50-percent credit at all levels for fiscal year 1978 would be $33 million.

Fiscal year 1979, $826 million.

Fiscal year 1980, $1.4 billion.

Fiscal year 1981, $1.6 billion.

The amendment would provide significant aid to middle- and lower-income families who send their children to nonpublic schools. These families bear a double burden: They support public education through their taxes, and they pay for their own children's education with their own after-tax dollars. The decline in private school enrollments over the last decade, both in total enrollment and percentage of school-age children, demonstrates that many parents can no longer afford to exercise their freedom of choice in education. This amendment would help those parents. Moreover, it would help preserve diversity in education at the elementary and secondary level.

This amendment has broad support. Numerous witnesses appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means to support it. They represented both sectarian and nonsectarian private schools. They came from the inner city, the suburbs, and from rural areas. They represented a widespread, deeply felt need for aid to private education.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment will help meet that need, and I urge its adoption.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VANIK. I am happy to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I thank the distinguished gentleman from Ohio for yielding.

I appreciate the gentleman's leadership in this matter. He is submitting this amendment on behalf of both of us, and I do concur in the statement that it is an essential element of the total bill.

I think we have very little disagreement in the area of postsecondary tuition tax credits, and I just hope we are going to be able to add elementary and secondary tax credits.

I think the point the gentleman makes about spreading a little equity and about building good will among those parents who have children in nonpublic schools and who vote on public school bond issues and referenda, and so forth, is exceedingly important.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) has expired.

(On request of Mr. FRENZEL, and by unanimous consent, Mr. VANIK was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will continue to yield, I am sure he will agree that the bill is not calculated to hurt the public school system. We are not trying to lure anyone out of the public school system. We are simply trying to preserve a choice for the people who are ready and willing to make a sacrifice and want to continue making it. Is that not true?

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, that is precisely true. As a matter of fact, I do not believe this tuition tax credit is going to expand the private school sector at all. All this would serve to do would be to slow down the attrition in the private school system which has gone on very steadily for some time.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman. I hope this amendment is agreed to, and I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. LEDERER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the tuition tax credit concept and in support of Congressman VANIK's amendment to reinstate elementary and secondary nonpublic schools back into the proposal.

Both the House and Senate committees have taken giant and historic steps toward the enactment of this legislation. As a member of the Ways and Means Committee, I have supported tuition legislation for all levels of nonpublic education.

Mr. Chairman, the concept of tuition relief legislation has received a great deal of support from all segments of our society. The credit being proposed will allow parents of children attending nonpublic schools, those who bear the increasing costs of private education, to keep a few more tax dollars when they file their return. It is a meaningful beginning to tax reduction. Nonpublic education does not cost, it pays.

Mr. Chairman, I have long been a strong supporter of public education. Public education has served this Nation well and will continue to serve for many years to come. I cannot agree with those who claim that tuition legislation will destroy our public schools. Tuition legislation will only destroy the potential for this Government to create more bureaucratic positions in HEW to administer more complicated and unfair educational aid programs. More importantly, tuition tax credits have been carefully designed to insure that they will benefit those parents who want, and have every right, to send their children to the schools of their choice and will not be harmful in any way to the great public school systems around this Nation. The credit will help maintain the current balance between public (90.2 percent) and private (9.8 percent) elementary and secondary school enrollment. Thus, this legislation will not promote a wholesale exodus from our public schools. It will continue to give parents freedom of choice in how they want their children educated. Nonpublic education will continue the competition in the educational community and that can only serve to improve our public schools—not destroy them.

Mr. Chairman, the vote of the Committee on Ways and Means in deleting elementary and secondary schools deviates sharply from the continued development of equity in our tax law—reference was made by some Members who opposed including elementary and secondary nonpublic education under tax tuition credit legislation to constitutional considerations, in order to justify this action. However, the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Wheeler against Barrera, deciding a year after "Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty against Nyquist," emphasized the necessity of providing comparable services for all children. I submit that there is nothing in any of the cases adjudicated by the Supreme Court which sanction the departure from the principle of equity.

The vote of the committee, I submit, is a deviation from these basic constitutional and legislative principles. It also cannot be asserted that there is a justification for this anomaly on the ground that the public school system is a national school system, for our Constitution does not authorize such an institution. This legislation before us has widespread implications which demand a more critical assessment of the role which private education plays in this country and the need for protecting the liberty of the parents who send their children to these schools.

Additionally, this Congress has a responsibility to act based on the facts as we know them—not on the actions of the Supreme Court. We are a coequal branch of Government and our actions must not be thwarted by the actions of another coequal branch of Government.

Mr. Chairman, this House has not failed in its responsibility to act on other areas of aid to nonpublic institutions. For example, medicare money goes not only to public hospital patients but also to private hospital patients. We did not see fit to exclude those people who are treated at private hospitals from receiving the benefits of our medical assistance programs. Also, this Congress acted in providing aid under titles I and IV of Elementary and Secondary Education Act, the Bilingual Education Act, and other areas that require the participation of children in nonpublic schools in these programs on an equitable basis with other children. No—this Congress acted and I am confident will act responsibly again.

Mr. Chairman, there are those who will charge that this tuition legislation helps the rich at the expense of the poor. I submit that this assertion fails to consider the realities of our current educational setup. In my city, many of our poor have a choice, an alternative to public education. Poor children have in many cities around the country made up part of private elementary and secondary schools. They have taken this opportunity because they had the option—that option is beginning to close. Many of these poor parents cannot meet the evergrowing costs of educating their children in the private schools. They have, in effect, lost their option to nonpublic education.

Mr. Chairman, I support tuition tax credits being applied to all levels of education, because I support excellence in education for all Americans. It is time this Congress take the action some Americans want and deserve and that we pass a comprehensive tuition tax bill.

Mr. KETCHUM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, at the time of the general debate on this whole issue of tuition tax credits, whether to colleges or to elementary or secondary education, I indicated that I would speak in opposition to this amendment.

I know that a good number of the Members have been visited by members of the teaching profession in the public schools and have been warned that if this amendment were to pass, it would be the death of public education. I do not agree with that thesis. Nor do I agree that if we do not offer tax credits for elementary and secondary private schools that there will be an exodus from the private schools. That simply is not true.

Mr. Chairman, why do people send their children to private schools? I would presume that, in some cases, it is for a religious experience. In some cases, it is for disciplinary reasons that the parents do not choose to hack by themselves, but would rather let that devolve upon the schools to which they are attending. And, third, for the least valid reason of all, that "my child is not receiving an education in the public schools." I say "least valid reason of all" because I believe, if we were to discuss that situation with those parents and ask them the question, "How long has it been since you have visited a school board meeting and demanded that your child be educated properly to read and write and spell and add and subtract and to know at least a little bit about the history of this country?" that they would tell us that had not been. And that is their responsibility.

Mr. Chairman, I would further suggest that if the Members were to survey their own districts in any school board election, at least one that does not involve a bond issue of some sort, they will find out that less than 15 percent of the electorate even bother to vote in the school board election. That would certainly indicate a little less than overriding interest in what is happening in our public schools today.

Therefore, to say to those individuals that they are now bearing a double burden is a falsity. Certainly they are paying to send their children to private schools, but they are doing so of their own free will. No one has a gun in their back telling them that they have to send their children to private schools.

Mr. Chairman, if we believe as we have stated in our Constitution—at least, in our State constitution—that one of our most important responsibilities as taxpayers is to support public education, then I think we cannot vote for this particular amendment.

Some of the arguments made of double taxation I think are just absolutely invalid. As I pointed out earlier today, those individuals who are single, those childless married couples, and those individuals who are retired contribute to the property tax; they contribute to the State income tax; and they contribute to the Federal income tax. Now, if this amendment were to pass, we would be asking those people to subsidize even further those individuals who have assumed a responsibility, presumably, by the mere fact of having children.

I cannot see how anyone can subscribe to that particular thesis.

Mr. SISK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHUM. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SISK. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate my colleague's yielding.

I want to join with my colleague, the gentleman from California (Mr. KETCHUM), in his remarks. I think he hit the nail on the head.

I strongly oppose this amendment and for many of the same reasons my colleague does.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate his comments.

Mr. KETCHUM. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

I would further state that this is a political year. This is a very sexy amendment, and it is going to appeal to a rather substantial number of the people in Members' districts; but I submit that we are sent here not for political expediency, but to do what is right for the majority of the people in our district.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the Members will bear that in mind and not think this job is too important to do otherwise.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHUM. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Apropos of the gentleman's comments by the sellers of this proposal, who as the gentleman are saying that this is great tax relief for people.

We have checked, and we find that something less than 3.5 percent of the taxpaying families of this country can ever benefit from the Vanik amendment. There are only 3.5 percent of the taxpaying families who would qualify for dollar one under the Vanik amendment. That is not a very broad-based tax relief program.

Mr. CORMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

(Mr. CORMAN asked and was given

Mr. Chairman, I agree with my colleague, the gentleman from California (Mr. KETCHUM). He has laid out the potential problem posed if we further diminish the pressures to keep a good public education system.

However, there has been a lot of talk about this being some kind of tax relief for poor people. If we start down this road, we will soon be at the $5-billion-a-year mark. There is no question about that.

Mr. Chairman, let me tell the Members what we could do if we were to cut taxes by $5 billion. We could remove competely from the tax rolls the bottom 30 percent of the people who now pay taxes, that is, people who file joint returns, who make up to $11,459 a year.

A person with a family of four to support pays an income tax of $722 if he makes that much a year. That is in addition to sales, social security, and the numerous other taxes he pays.

Mr. Chairman, if we want to give real tax relief to those who need it most desperately, let us get that bottom 30 percent off the income tax rolls. We can do that for the same price that this bill will cost.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORMAN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend my colleague, the gentleman from California (Mr. CORMAN), and associate myself with his remarks.

I urge our colleagues to reject the Vanik amendment.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say that H. L. Mencken once wrote:

> For every problem there is a solution that is simple, logical, and wrong.

With all due respect to those who support this approach, Mr. Chairman, I believe that quotation very well characterizes the amendment upon which we are about to vote.

Mr. Chariman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. KETCHUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORMAN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KETCHUM. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I regret having to use additional time.

Our colleague, the gentleman from Maryland, pointed out that the cost of this bill will reach as high as $5.8 billion.

Let me suggest to the body that that is only this time. When the people really find out what a miniscule amount this is, they will be back over and over and over again, and $10 or $20 billion will be nothing.

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Chairman, one of the prime considerations of this amendment ought to be the cost that we think would be involved. The report we have, the estimate, shows that it would only be about $780 million this year, but if we add the Vanik amendment, it would only be about $1.1 billion. The other body has already recommended a bill that would cost over $5 billion.

I do not think anyone ought to kid himself that, as we embark on this program, it will not grow, because that is what has happened on other programs, such as revenue sharing. I submit to the Members that this is another little revenue-sharing program that is going to get bigger and bigger.

Members ought to think of the cost, let alone the policy. We ought to ask ourselves, can we afford another $4 or $5 billion addition to the deficit? Everybody agrees that there can be appeal for this kind of help, but because of the cost alone on this pending amendment I hope Members realize that they are starting in motion a program that has consequences far beyond this day of reckoning, and we ought to keep that in mind.

Mr. CORMAN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this amendment. I think that the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. GORE) put his finger on it when he mentioned the simplicity and the seeming logic of this proposal, and how we are trying to sweep a lot of complications under the rug.

There has been some reference already to the language that appears in the bill which seems to suggest that the private schools that will be helped by the Vanik amendment will not have to comply with various other provisions of Federal law. For instance, there is a provision on page 9 of the bill which says:

TAX CREDIT NOT TO BE CONSIDERED AS FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO INSTITUTION.—Any educational institution which enrolls a student for whom a tax credit is claimed under this Act shall not be considered to be a recipient of Federal assistance under this Act.

The purpose of that seemingly innocuous language is to avoid the applicability of a lot of other provisions of Federal laws which apply to all schools that do get Federal assistance. For example, all public schools must serve all handicapped children with an appropriate free education. We are catching a lot of heat about Public Law 94–142, in which we mandated that the public schools must provide resources for physically handicapped children. Under the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, public schools must remove all architectural barriers.

Under a Supreme Court decision, public schools are required to provide children an education in language they can understand. Under title IX of the Education Act, public schools are required to provide equal academic, athletic, and extracurricular activities regardless of sex. Failure to meet any of these standards causes a school to lose public aid.

Well, simplistically—and that is the only way I can describe it—there is an attempt to short circuit all those provisions as far as private elementary and secondary schools are concerned that will benefit as a result of this amendment, by saying that they will not be deemed to receive Federal assistance.

How long do Members think that little bubble can last? How long do Members think we can continue to apply one set of standards to schools that are taking some children and another set of standards to some other schools that are taking other children, even though both are getting Federal assistance?

The argument made as to why the tuition tax credit should apply to elementary and secondary education is that parents who are sending children to those schools are treated unequally. That is true, but those schools are not required to meet all the obligations to take all comers that the public schools do. Some of the private school educators and parents in my district are farsighted enough to see that if the two sets of schools are to be given some kind of parity of treatment, they must be given some kind of parity of treatment in obligations. Perhaps we ought to say that all schools must remove the architectural barriers and have the same athletic facilities regardless of sex and meet all other limitations and restrictions and requirements we insist on for the public schools.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MIKVA. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I want to say I wholeheartedly agree with the statement being made by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA). He is making a very important point particularly for those who think they are going to get a bonanza because those in the private schools are going to find the long arm of the Federal Government is going to modify many of the reasons why they have those private schools.

Mr. Chairman, the House will address the issue of tuition tax credits today. The bill provides for a nonrefundable income tax credit against tuition that taxpayers pay for themselves, their spouse or dependents to eligible postsecondary educational institutions. The tax credit would equal 25 percent of the tuition paid by a taxpayer, up to a maximum of $100 in 1978, $150 in 1979, and $250 in 1980. The bill, if enacted into law, is expected to reduce revenues by 16 million in 1978, $417 million in 1979, $780 million in 1980, and $896 million in 1981.

Representative MIKVA will offer a substitute bill to permit deferral of income taxes for college tuition expenses, which the taxpayer would repay over 10 years. The maximum deferral per student per year would be $1,000 beginning in 1978, $1,500 beginning in 1982, and $2,000 beginning in 1986. This substitute bill is expected to reduce revenues of $199 million in 1978, $1.3 billion annually in years 1979–81, $1.2 billion in 1982, $1.6 billion in 1983, and ever-decreasing amounts after that, with a revenue gain beginning in 1992.

I am opposed to the tax tuition credit bill because such credits are an inefficient, inequitable, and ineffective way to offer financial relief from college tuition costs. Tuition tax credits would not benefit low-income families or working students who are supported by their families. Because the tax credit would be nonrefundable, a low-income family with little or no tax liability would get little or no benefit from it. Further, working students who pay their own tuition, but are claimed as dependents by their parents, would be ineligible.

I support the tax deferral concept because it is targeted to middle- and lower-income families. The substitute bill successfully targets relief where it is most needed—at cash-short college parents. For example, the deferral concept will ease the tax burden of parents with two children in college by $2,000 this year, as opposed to $200 in relief under the tuition tax credit scheme.

The tuition tax credit bill will create a substantial drain on the Treasury, whereas, the deferral concept with the tax paybacks and interest will produce a revenue gain by 1992. Unlike the tuition tax credit scheme, the deferral concept offers enough money to be really helpful.

An amendment will be offered on the floor of the House to provide for tuition tax credits for elementary and secondary schools. After much study and thought on my part, I have decided the proposal does not provide enough benefit to the taxpayer to be worth its cost. The base of support for middle-class parents took advantage of the tax subsidy for private education.

Also, as the private schools are given the benefit of a tax credit, it will serve as an invitation for Federal control. The religious private schools might be subject to the mandate of the U.S. Supreme Court and not be allowed to have their morning devotions or other religious functions. More controls may be invoked in order to maintain the tax exemption of private schools, or even worse, the schools might lose their tax-exempt status. Title X of the United States Code would also require the schools to offer equal activities regardless of sex.

Most of the private schools in our Nation were formed to be free from government control. By accepting a Federal tax credit in 1978, the private schools will have subjected themselves to Federal control by the Congress and the Federal courts in the future. By extending blanket assistance to all children in private schools the aid will not be targeted to those who need it most.

Mr. MIKVA. I thank the gentleman from Florida.

There is a pluralism in American education and I support it and I have tried to help it over the years, as have most of the Members of this House; but I think that pluralism is not helped when we try to create an equality in something that is not capable of being equal, when the very same reasons for those differences has created the diversity that is the pluralism. We do not have to ask the private schools to take everybody when they are not the recipients of public benefits. But if both sets of schools are receiving public benefits, then they must both accept all children.

Mr. LUKEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MIKVA. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LUKEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say as far as the idea of parity which the gentleman used, it is really an exaggeration to suggest that this bill or any bill that has been suggested would accomplish parity.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. KILDEE). The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA) has expired.

(On request of Mr. LUKEN, and by unanimous consent, Mr. MIKVA was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. LUKEN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I think it is an indication that even with this bill, and even if we went to the Senate bill, there would still be a financial sacrifice being made if we give much less than half that contemplated with the Senate bill, but with this bill, even a very small proportion, for instance, of the parents in my district in Cincinnati are paying 92 percent, which is not being paid by anybody but the parents, and they are going to get 25 percent, which is not parity. Therefore there is a pluralism being maintained.

Mr. MIKVA. According to the Secretary of HEW, the Senate bill would put us in a position of conferring four times as much Federal benefit on the private schools per pupil as we are per pupil in the public schools.

I only say to my distinguished colleague that with that kind of disparity we know what kind of parity is going to be insisted upon as far as the obligations and the responsibilities are concerned, and I am sure the gentleman will insist on that too.

Mr. LUKEN. We are not discussing the Senate bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

(On request of Mr. FORD of Michigan, and by unanimous consent, Mr. MIKVA was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MIKVA. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LUKEN) just repeated what the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK), the sponsor of this amendment, said in his opening statement, that we should not worry about the principle because we are only talking about 50 bucks, which is not very much. But just who in this country, in the middle class trying to educate children in the nonpublic schools, because that is the kind of education they prefer in our pluralistic society, is going to be fooled by the $50 they get back some 6 months after the school year starts, will believe this has some kind of influence as far as their effort to keep their schools in existence?

We know very well that when this gets back to the people and they find out what kind of fraud it is, when we are saying it is going to help them keep their kids in those schools. Federal aid to education amounts to $78 per child for nonpublic school children at the present time and given the present methodology being used, those parents will see that amendment will not help them. It is obviously the hope of the sponsors of the legislation that we will believe that it is only $50 and it does not mean very much and it is not going to cost very much. But what about the cost when it comes back from conference with the other body?

How are you, who are in support of the Vanik amendment at this point, going to go home and explain to your people, the people who have been given to understand for months and months that they are going to get $500 to help provide for the education of their children, how are you, on the basis of that, going to sell them to the fact that they are now going to get $50?

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, let me say that $50 is for the first year, then there is the second year and the full implementation of the bill is for $100. Let me say further that in urban communities, such as the gentleman now in the well and I represent, the cost of a student in an elementary private school is very low, in many places it is $200 and in some places it is as low as $100. So this becomes a very significant contribution to the cost of that child's education.

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, I think the point my colleague was making concerns the vagaries of the other body.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. MIKVA was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, I believe my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) is well aware that, given the vagaries of the ways of the other body, it is quite likely, and quite possible that the figures that are contained in the Vanik amendment will be much lower than those in the Senate-passed product, and we will be asked to support the higher figures in that conference report when it comes back from the other body.

The dilemma contained in this amendment is that if it is too little, if it is not sufficient to really help the private school parents, then we aren't doing anything to the contrary, if it is sufficient to help the private schools parents, then I say that the private schools ought to have to accept the physically handicapped and do the other things, just as the public schools do; if we are providing them with that much help that it is really that important, then I repeat, I feel that important, they ought to be required to take everyone just like the public schools. But Mr. Chairman, if we are not providing enough help to be meaningful then I believe that the people and we ought to know that.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, let me say that in dealing with the makeup of the House conferees versus the Senate conferees, one could assume that the position of the House is going to be very strongly supported.

Mr. MIKVA. I must confess, Mr. Chairman, that I was thinking about the makeup of the Senate conferees.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. STEIGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the Vanik amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. FORD) my distinguished friend, got me exercised about this and I must say I have been sort of restrained up to now in speaking, but because of this, I thought I ought to become involved.

I have been fascinated with the discussion that has been taking place this afternoon. Some, like my friend the gentleman from California (Mr. KETCHUM) have indicated that they believe it is an act of political courage if we vote against the Vanik amendment, and others think it is an act of courage if we vote for the Vanik amendment. I am one of those, who, as I look around my district, just like, whoever it was so long ago, who said, "Well, some of my friends are for it and some of my friends are against it, and I am with my friends." I will be darned if I know, on an issue such as this that cuts as deeply as this one does, how to judge courage. You will catch it both ways on this, I do not care how you vote.

I am not sure that there is any courage at all involved in the sense of which way you vote. But I really do believe, if we are to embark upon this program—and I have misgivings about this, this is not what I would do or how I would draw it on my own, whatever level of money is involved in this legislation, and whatever it does, when it comes back from the conference, we frankly are not going to be dealing with that issue that we ought to be dealing with and that is the major issue of the rising tax burden on middle Americans. Let me say that middle Americans are composed of all kinds of people, childless couples, senior citizens, those who have one child versus those who have four children. I believe there are so many more effective, direct ways to assist than the one we are dealing with today. But when I got all said and done, I lost on that. I did not have that chance in the committee, but I will have that chance when we get to the Mikva amendment on post secondary education. But what we are dealing with here and now is elementary schools. I think on the basis of fairness, on the basis of the economic situation and on the basis of the burden issue that the Vanik amendment ought to be adopted. Many of those who lessen their support on public education do so because they have made the decision, without any aid or assistance, to put their children in nonpublic schools, and that is one of the reasons they are saying over and over again, "No, I won't go for a higher bond issue, no, I won't go for a higher salary increase because I get nothing from it."

At some point we are going to have to come to grips with it, whether it is the revolt in California under Jarvis, whether it is the issue of social security, whether it is any one of a number of issues on which the Congress is very behind its counterparts in the State legislatures in recognizing the pertinent issue. That is what is involved in this amendment, and that is why the Vanik amendment ought to be adopted.

Do not give me that argument, I will say to my friend, the gentleman from Michigan, that somehow we are going to give $78 for books and educational equipment for nonpublic school children and soothe our conscience that we are taking care of the nonpublic schools, because we are not. We are not dealing effectively with the problem of the burden of those who are parents of children in nonpublic schools. Most of all, what got me exercised is the kind of sophomoric argument which the gentleman was using.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEIGER. I will not at this time, but I will yield to the gentleman later because I have used his name frequently.

He can use this argument that somehow there is a charade going on. There is not. Let us not kid ourselves. The burden for tuition in the nonpublic schools in the typical sixth district school is $50 for elementary. It is up to $350 for high school. That is the maximum. There is a significant assistance that is involved in the Vanik amendment, so I think that argument, it seems to me, falls of its own weight. There is nobody holding out any kind of charade about what is proposed in this amendment. It is not designed to deal with the same kind of problems of postsecondary education, which I hope we will deal with in the Mikva amendment, which is a far more effective way to handle it.

Now I will be delighted to yield, with some trepidation, to my friend, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. FORD).

Mr. FORD of Michigan. I thank the gentleman who has been a friend of mine for many years, in spite of the remarks he has just made. I will not characterize his statements as sophomoric because I know, because of his many years of service on the Committee on Education and Labor before he went to the committee now handling this legislation, that he knows better. He knows, in fact, that that committee consistently from the beginning of aid to elementary and secondary schools in 1965 has, in conjunction with all the best lawyers that the parochial schools have provided to assist us, written into every phase of aid to education full equality of treatment limited only to the extent that there is a specific constitutional question raised. The magic figure of $78 against $128 is not selected out of any intention to discriminate against nonpublic schools.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(At the request of Mr. FORD of Michigan, and by unanimous consent, Mr. STEIGER was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. FORD of Michigan. If the gentleman will yield further, the distinction here is that all of the existing legislation on the books at the Federal level says that all children without regard to where they attend school will be served "unless * * *". We do not put the "unless" in; the court put the "unless" in—unless somebody comes in with a judge and puts some kind of limitation on it.

The Vanik amendment only talks about children who are in schools that are being paid for in part by tuition and for the most part by religious organizations, schools, as the gentleman knows, that are not primarily intended to be a substitute for the public school but as an alternative to the public school, that have a religious orientation and a mission to teach religion as their primary function.

Mr. STEIGER. I will thank my friend, the gentleman from Michigan.

I will take 10 seconds back only to say that I understand the argument the gentleman is making. In spite of what I said, he may call me a freshman, and I will call him a sophomore. That is fine. I do not agree with how he comes down in terms of this problem, nor do I agree, frankly, that what has been done under the Elementary and Secondary Education Act in fact provides that kind of equity of treatment. I simply do not think that is what happens under the way the present law operates, Wisconsin being the classic case.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(At the request of Mr. FREY, and by unanimous consent, Mr. STEIGER was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. FREY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEIGER. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. FREY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, first let me say that I am delighted that we are considering this issue of tuition tax credits. It is an issue that I have pushed practically since I have been in the Congress. Regardless of how one may feel on the issue, it should be discussed in depth and voted upon.

Part of this bill and issue is easy, and that is the part that gives tax credits for colleges and universities, vocational and technical schools at post-secondary level, and business and trade schools at post-secondary level. I say it is easy because in my opinion the GI bill was the best investment that this country ever made. And of course there is a tremendous need. In the past 5 years, average tuition fees were raised 54 percent at private 4 year institutions and 57 percent at public 4 year institutions. Today the average cost of a year in residence at a four year private college is about $5,000 and a public college is about $3,000. Of course, the largest amount of tax relief in the House bill is directed at the middle income taxpayer. And it is the middle and lower income tax family who's students as a result of inflation are not able to attend school. As a result of inflation, 20 percent fewer students from this area group are pursuing higher education. According to the Ways and Means Committee the largest amount of tax relief is directed at the middle-income taxpayer. Seventy-two percent of the tax benefits will go to those making between $10,000–$30,000.

I also favor the tax tuition credit compared to any other means. Providing assistance through tax credits and the tax system minimizes the bureaucracy, cuts the costs, and gets the dollars directly to those who have the use for it.

A tougher question is the tuition tax credits which go to elementary and secondary schools. In order to make a decision on this, one should understand the facts. In 1966, 80 percent of all elementary and secondary school students in the United States were enrolled in the public schools. In 1976, 90 percent of all students attended public schools. Of those attending private schools, 71 percent come from families with incomes under $25,000 and fewer than 4 percent have family incomes over $50,000. Private schools serve a function not only of competition but serve the public interest by keeping school taxes down. If the 7.7 million students now enrolled in private schools nationwide were enrolled in tax supported schools, the bill to taxpayers would be approximately $17 billion annually. This figure is significant considering that the entire package in the House would be $417 million in fiscal year 1979, $870 in fiscal year 1980, and $896 in fiscal year 1981. In Florida approximately 200,000 students go to private schools. Consider the tax impact if all 200,000 entered Florida's school system. Florida could not afford it. There are obviously problems with the elementary and secondary tuition grants.

The first question is will it destroy the public school system. The grants in the House bill of $50 tax credit for the first year and $100 for the next 2 years makes that assumption somewhat spurious. A $50 or $100 tax credit will do little more than help; it is certainly not the deciding factor in sending a child to private school. There is also the constitutional question involved. I think that it is fair to say that will be resolved if this law is passed by the Supreme Court. What leads me to support the tuition credits for the elementary and secondary school is the fact that it is a 3-year bill and we can look and see what impact it will have on the public education system. Let us face it. No one really knows. It could be that the added competition to the public school system will be beneficial. In my opinion, education, is a priority item in this country. I obviously do not want to do anything to injure it. And, we know that we are not doing a good enough job. Just look at Florida's recent tests.

It appears on balance that this program is worth trying. If problems develop at the end of 3 years, it obviously does not have to be renewed. I think that all groups that support this legislation should be on notice that it is only a trial.

Mr. STEIGER. Mr. Chairman, I thank my colleague, the gentleman from Florida, for that remark. I think it is worth trying it out to see what happens. I am not sure any of us know in all of this what will happen and I suppose in a real sense we are all operating out of some kind of gut instinct.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEIGER. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding. I want to agree with his remarks, state my reasons for supporting this amendment, and emphasize one strong point the gentleman made.

First, I believe tuition tax credits offer an effective, straightforward, simple way to offer financial relief to people who choose private education alternatives. Since the beginning of this Republic, we have seen fit to have a public policy of taxing the population as a whole to offer educational opportunities to the population as a whole. Also, since the beginning of the country, we have seen the rise and growth of a great variety of nonpublic schools which offer similar educational opportunities to Americans. It is in the public interest to offer some small amount of financial relief in a time of sharply rising costs, through a tax credit mechanism, to people who choose to educate themselves at nonpublic schools while they continue to pay their share of taxes for public education. We have long offered, directly or indirectly, Government funds to private education institutions through direct grant programs and charitable contribution deductions. The public policy reasons for this use of public funds are obvious. The existence of a strong private system has an extremely positive effect on our goal of reaching a high level of education for all of our citizens. The extension of this principle makes logical and practical sense.

In conclusion, I would emphasize again a very important point made by the gentleman from Wisconsin. Some argue that such an extension will jeopardize funding and participation regarding the public school sector. I argue the opposite. I believe our failure to offer a modest tax break for private school tuition in fact jeopardizes our public education system. The key words here are "tax effort" and "tax relief." The elementary and secondary public school systems are financed through the local tax effort decided at local tax elections. In the past years we have witnessed increased and severe difficulty in enacting local tax increases for public school systems. The kind of tax relief that is envisioned in this legislation would make individuals who support private educational institutions much more ready to increase their tax effort regarding public education. Our continued failure to offer such tax relief will insure that local property tax elections for public education will continue to meet unreasonable resistance and defeat.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. VANIK, and by unanimous consent, Mr. STEIGER was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEIGER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the gentleman from Wisconsin for his contribution to the debate on this amendment.

I want to point out for the benefit of my colleagues in the committee that this legislation has its own sunset. It is a 3-year bill. In my judgment, when Congress ventures out on a new kind of program, the program ought in all cases to be reviewed by more than one Congress so that we can determine the effect of it. Then we can determine what the response will be and we can determine what effect the program has on the country before we make it permanent law.

I think this is an important characteristic of this bill. This bill is unique among all the legislation we have offered in the Committee on Ways and Means. It is a 3-year measure so that we can have experience in this matter and judge later whether or not the program should be made permanent.

Mr. STEIGER. Mr. Chairman, I thank my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio. I think the gentleman from Ohio in what he said and my friend, the gentleman from Missouri in his thoughtful analysis, have made to me in the end the most persuasive arguments on behalf of this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. HAGEDORN).

Mr. HAGEDORN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the so-called Vanik amendment to the Tuition Tax Credit Act which would extend the credit provided in the act to elementary and secondary schools.

This is one of the most significant legislative initiatives in the area of education in many years. Not only will it relieve many families of the very real financial burdens of educating their children, but it is also likely to result in an improved caliber of education.

The exciting thing about this amendment is that it opens up the possibility of improved educational opportunities without increasing the budget of HEW, without adding to their bureaucracy, without cluttering up the Federal Register with fine-print regulations, and without involving the social planners in Washington any more deeply in family and local affairs.

Parents would simply be allowed to keep a bit more of their income to cover their children's tuition costs, while a little old-fashioned competition would be provided to the public schools in those areas of the country where these schools are clearly failing in their educational mission.

I have heard a great deal of talk that the Vanik amendment would destroy public education in this country. To the extent that this is a true argument, it seems to me that its proponents are conceding that the public schools are doing an ineffective job. Providing parents with a $100 or $250 tax credit is not likely to induce many parents to desert the public school system in which their children are receiving a decent education. I certainly do not believe that the tax credit will cause many parents to leave the excellent public schools that exist in most of Minnesota.

Those who stand to benefit most from this legislation, in my opinion, are those low- and middle-income parents and children who are denied all measure of free choice in their education, and who must continue to patronize public schools, frequently in the more urban areas of our Nation, which devote as much time to babysitting as to education.

These parents are simply unable to indulge in the luxury of paying private school tuition while also being required to support an empty seat in a public school classroom with their taxes. For these parents, the tuition tax credit is no windfall, and no undeserved bounty, but simply a method by which they can recover a portion of their tax revenues from which they receive no benefit.

Introducing this element of competition to these public schools will benefit not only those students who choose to patronize the competition, but also these students remaining in public schools which, for the first time, will be required to respond to competition.

While, as I have observed, I do not believe that the tax credit will undermine the public schools, I believe that we must be vigilant also to insure that the credit does not undermine genuinely private education. It is no secret that Federal encouragement of, and assistance to various good causes is invariably followed by Federal regulation of those who have received the encouragement and assistance.

I would not support this legislation, or this amendment, if I believed that it would gradually lead to an erosion of those qualities that make private education distinctive in this country. In the guise of attaching minimum eligibility standards to the credit, we should exercise great care to see that we do not simply homogenize our public and private school systems. IRS regulations should not be made a vehicle for federalizing the schools of our country.

Mr. Chairman, for millions of middle-income families, this legislation will provide much-needed financial relief for the burdens of tuition; for millions of lower income families, who have no alternative than to endure the worst in public education in this country, this legislation offers some light at the end of the tunnel.

With respect to the constitutionality of the tuition tax credit, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues the statements of University of Chicago law professor, Antonin Scalia, and Carleton University professor, E. G. West, both of which I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on April 4, 1978 (E1648). I believe that these statements point out clearly the constitutional integrity of H.R. 12050 and the immediate amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. BURKE of Massachusetts, and by unanimous consent, Mr. STEIGER was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. BURKE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEIGER. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BURKE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I just want to take this time to compliment the gentleman here at the microphone. A few months ago I asked the question, "Where are the Vandenbergs of yesterday?"

Here is the kind of young man who is becoming the new Vandenberg of this House. Here is a young man who has shown a great deal of leadership. He is farsighted in his approach to legislation. I wish some of the Members on my side of the aisle would listen to this young man, because he poses a definite threat to the membership on our side of the aisle.

This young man has shown great and farsighted leadership, not only on this question but also on the question of social security. I am proud to associate myself with his remarks today.

I hope the Members on our side who are opposing the Vanik amendment will recognize the problems they are creating. We have to do something in this Nation for the middle-income people who are paying the bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. STEIGER) has expired.

(On request of Mr. BURKE of Massachusetts, and by unanimous consent, Mr. STEIGER was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. BURKE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, we have to do something in this Nation to improve the quality of education. As I pointed out before, youngsters are graduating from high school and they cannot read or write. We have schools in this Nation plagued with violence, with drugs, and with discipline problems.

Mr. Chairman, this is a very mild approach to try to correct that situation. Again, I compliment and commend the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. STEIGER).

Mr. STEIGER. Mr. Chairman, I thank my friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BURKE), very, very much.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Vanik amendment.

I know that we could debate for some time the constitutional questions involved here, and each of us could come up on different sides. But suffice it to say that as far as Supreme Court decisions today are concerned, certainly even the proponents of this amendment would have to say that the weight of authority is on the side that the Vanik amendment, standing alone, is totally unconstitutional. The only way an amendment such as the Vanik proposal could, in my opinion, satisfy the test of constitutionality would be to have it attached to a bill calling for aid to public sector colleges so as to try to meet the objections of the Nyquist case. Even when so attached as is attempted here, I believe there is still a constitutional violation; and, the cherished principle of church-state separation is too important to abandon.

However, I do not want to discuss only the question of constitutionality. I think the amendment is unconstitutional, but I can understand how my colleagues on the other side might come up with a well-considered argument that because of certain circumstances in this case it could be constitutional, if one disregards the Nyquist case.

My colleague, the gentleman from Illinois, raised a very important question when he talked about our inviting the restrictions and the complications of HEW into the private schools of this Nation. While he was speaking, I recalled a statement made a few weeks ago by Dr. Fred Davidson, president of the University of Georgia, in a speech when he discussed these Federal intervention problems. President Davidson spoke of a little college in the State of Michigan. I would like to urge the Members to listen to this for a moment, because in my opinion we are beginning the end of our private schools with this amendment.

President Davidson spoke of Hillsdale College as—> a 133 year old independent school in Michigan with an enrollment of about 1,000 and a splendid record for experimentation and innovation.

Dr. Davidson continues as follows:

> It routinely admitted blacks before the Civil War and was one of the few colleges in America to graduate women.

As a matter of fact, Hillsdale College graduated the first woman.

Hillsdale has never accepted Federal money for fear of jeopardizing its independence. It has relied entirely on fees and private support for financing. But about 10 percent of Hillsdale's student body, he says, receives benefits under the GI bill. This is its only source of Federal funding, and this is allotted to the student and not to the college.

HEW has now come in, he says, and "Under section 86.2 of HEW's regulations issued under title 9 of the Higher Education Act of 1972, this is being construed as Federal assistance.

"Accordingly, HEW contends that tiny Hillsdale is subject to every stipulation and rule that applies to every college and university that accepts Federal money." My friends, this is the beginning of the end of the private schools that so many of the Members champion. Most of our students attend public schools, over 90 percent of them, but I believe in the dual system of education. This bill may not destroy public education; but, it will help destroy private education.

This is the first step in that approach.

I called the president of Hillsdale College about 30 minutes ago, and I asked him, "Is it true that these restrictions are being imposed upon you by HEW because 10 percent of your students are receiving the GI bill?" His answer was "yes." I then asked him if he favored the tuition credit proposals being debated today.

"Not if it means," he said, "that I have to give up the independence of the private school system—and I fear that, under the current decisions of HEW."

Is this what we want to do? I tell my colleagues from the conservative wing and from the other side of the aisle that we are inadvertently progressing, with this legislation, to do away with the private school system. This is the first step in that direction.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. JENKINS) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. JENKINS was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I say to my colleagues that the same people who are asking us today to give them assistance with this little $50 tax credit, will be the same people who will be coming back to us very shortly—very shortly—and saying, "Why in the world did you get HEW around our necks to destroy, that religious training and independence which we were trying to protect."

Mr. Chairman, this is a serious matter that all of us ought to give our most considered judgment. The public school sector will not feel that they should have to comply with HEW regulations if the private schools do not, regardless of the language of the Vanik amendment. This opens the door to total and complete domination of the private schools by HEW. This is a tragic mistake. We ought to defend the Constitution, protect the dual educational system of this Nation, and, to do that we must vote against this amendment.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment end at 3 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. KILDEE). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. BURKE of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support not only of H.R. 12050, the Tuition Tax Credit Act before us but also I support the Vanik amendment. For many, many years all of us have been hearing about the rising costs of a college education, a higher university education. We have heard continually, at least since I have been in the Congress, that relief should be given somewhere to the taxpayer or we are going to have a college system without students because of those who cannot afford to go to college because of high tuition costs.

The legislation before us does give us the chance to give them, the taxpayer, and the students some relief. I think it is just about time that they get some tax relief by way of a tax credit and, although this is not the best answer in the world to this problem it is at least the beginning of an ultimate solution if we are to solve this problem.

I support the Vanik amendment because I think each of us know from time to time we have had a continual rise in school taxes. While we have rising school taxes and the taxpayer burdened more and more with continual Federal, State, and local tax rises, also have had rises in all sectors of our economy which have burdened those who send their children to public schools.

Mr. Chairman, the most important thing for all is a good education for our children, and it should not make too much difference in which school they get educated. However, we find that those that send their children to the private schools cannot support the cost of the private school. People have the right of choice and the right to send their children to a private school if they wish to do so. I think the time has come, where they also should get some assistance to enable them to help in the cost.

Mr. Chairman, opponents of this legislation, at least of the concept, claim that these credits authorized under the amendments and the legislation would kill public education.

It is my honest opinion that this is absurd. With 90 percent of the children in our country enrolled in public schools, the tax credit offered will merely result in a healthy competition, making public schools more accountable to their communities.

The second and greatest argument of the opponents of the tax credit is with respect to the constitutionality of the proposal.

Mr. Chairman and my fellow Members, I have been an attorney for years, but I do not stand up and say that even though I am a constitutional lawyer prepared to give you the Court's final decision. Nevertheless, I am quite sure that none of us sitting here has the right to prejudge, in advance, what the Supreme Court is going to decide on this question, particularly since, in the past, the Court has never ruled on tuition tax credit as an issue of the separation of church and state. But it may well find it proper, on the basis of freedom of choice of parents and students, to uphold this legislation and I think it will.

Mr. Chairman, this legislation has a provision that insures the rapid and timely judicial review of the issues and states that it is the duty of the court of appeals and of the Supreme Court to expedite their disposition to the greatest extent possible. I am sure that this provision should relieve the fears of those who say it is unconstitutional and who have raised questions concerning the Congress usurping the powers of the Supreme Court, or of the executive branch, and of the Constitution itself. I do not believe this.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues, to not only support this legislation, but to support also the Vanik amendment which I think is a proper and a good amendment.

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of Florida. I yield to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of tuition tax relief legislation.

One of the first things that I did on arriving in Washington was to cosponsor legislation to provide tax credits to parents of children in college or advanced vocational-technical schools. I am extremely pleased that the Ways and Means Committee has at long last acted favorably on this legislation which originated with my good friend and Delaware colleague, Senator BILL ROTH.

I am also pleased that the House will have the opportunity to vote on an amendment to expand the tax credit to nonpublic elementary and secondary schools. I urge my colleagues to support this amendment, and provide much needed relief to the millions of families who send their children to private or parochial schools.

Mr. Chairman, in the past several years, the cost of education has skyrocketed. In the last 4 years, for example, costs at public and private 4-year colleges have risen by over 50 percent. Average annual costs now run between $3,000 and $5,000.

In addition, the cost of nonpublic elementary and secondary schools has increased substantially over the same period. Many students have had to switch from nonpublic to public schools, putting even greater pressures on public school resources. Local taxes have increased sharply to meet these rising expenses. A tax credit will provide some help to these nonpublic school parents who must pay for the increased costs of both public and nonpublic schools, even though they relieve the public schools of the costs of educating their children.

If we are interested in providing quality education to all, then we should strive to achieve that goal in both the public and private systems.

What we are really talking about is providing freedom of choice to American families. A tax credit for nonpublic elementary and secondary school costs will allow families to more easily choose the system which best fits their needs. I emphasize the phrase "more easily" because the tax credit will only offset a portion of the costs. But it is relief which is long overdue and will be welcomed by millions of American families.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, let me point out that tuition tax credits provide tax help for the middle-income American who is so often overlooked by government. Middle-income families have been taking it on the chin for too long, and they desperately need the relief envisioned by this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, it is time we let the American people keep a little more of the dollars, instead of sending them to Washington. I urge support of the bill, and of the amendments to increase the credit to 50 percent of tuition costs, and expand the coverage of the bill to private and parochial schools.

Every family should have the right and the opportunity to educate their children in the best manner possible. This legislation will help alleviate some of the heavy financial burden of education, improve the public system by encouraging competition, and allow more Americans to reach their highest potential.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of Florida. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I rise in support of the Vanik amendment which would extend the principle of modest tuition tax credits embodied in H.R. 12050 to the parents of children in nonpublic elementary and secondary schools. The credit would apply only to students attending nonprofit and nondiscriminatory educational institutions.

Since 1972, when I first introduced a bill to this effect, I have been of the view that parents of children in our parochial elementary and secondary schools should be able to get some help in meeting the burden of tuition costs through our Federal income tax system.

I at first thought that the logical way to provide such help would be to make such tuition payments deductible for income tax purposes, just as nontuition voluntary contributions to such schools have always been and are deductible. However, I soon realized that, in a congressional district such as mine, most of the parents of schoolchildren use the standard deduction method of computing their income taxes, so that they would not be helped by making tuition payments tax deductible.

Under the pending Vanik amendment, a tax credit of 25 percent of tuition (up to a maximum of $50 in 1978, and $100 in 1979 and 1980) would be allowed. This is very roughly comparable to the effect of allowing the deduction of such tuition payments from taxable income.

Accordingly, I believe this amendment will provide a reasonable and proper way to assist parents of private and parochial schoolchildren who have to make tuition payments, over and above whatever taxes or other expenses they have to pay to help meet the costs of the local public school system which they do not use. As has often been pointed out, in a city such as New York the existence of private schools—mainly parochial—relieves the public school system of a very large burden which it would not be able to meet without a large increase in taxes.

As to whether a system such as would be established under the pending Vanik amendment would be constitutional, that will be for the Supreme Court to decide, and the bill before us provides that such a court test be expedited.

While I support the pending Vanik amendment, I shall have to vote against the next Vanik amendment which would raise the percentage of tuition allowable as a tax credit from 25 percent to 50 percent. This would at one stroke virtually double the cost of the legislation in lost tax revenue to the Treasury and lead either to increased Federal deficits which fuel inflation or higher taxes. Moreover, and perhaps even more importantly, such assistance would no longer be comparable to the effect of making tuition payments tax deductible. In addition, tax credits at the 50-percent level might be sufficient to serve as an inducement to parents of public schoolchildren to transfer those children to private schools. That is a result which I believe would be most undesirable.

The fear of such a result, and the damage it would do to the public school system, has, I believe, caused many of my constituents to write to me in opposition to tuition tax credits. In my judgment, the fear is unjustified if the credit is limited to 25 percent.

I presume the second Vanik amendment will be defeated and I intend to vote for the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I voted against the rule governing debate of the "Tuition Tax Credit Act of 1978" because I felt it unduly restricted the amendments that could be offered. In particular, it should have allowed the House to decide, with respect to tuition payments for higher education, whether to substitute for tax credits the improvement of direct benefits favored by the President. Unfortunately, the Mikva amendment, which would move in that direction by providing liberal terms for loans for tuition through tax deferrals, can only be offered under the rule as a substitute for the entire bill. That means that the Mikva amendment would eliminate all assistance to the parents of nonpublic elementary and secondary schoolchildren. It would thus negate the adoption of the first Vanik amendment, which, for the reasons just explained, I favor. The rule thus unduly restricts the freedom of the Members to produce the kind of measure that I would prefer, to wit: One, a system of modest tax credits (not more than 25 percent) for parents of nonpublic elementary and secondary schoolchildren, and two, a system of improved loans and grants for students at higher educational institutions. I sincerely hope that as the legislative process continues on this issue of aid to parents for tuition costs, the resulting legislation will move closer to the dual system I have described.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I rise in opposition to the Vanik amendment.

In opposing the amendment, let me indicate one of the times when I had a great sense of pride in this House and in this Congress. It goes all the way back to 1954 when the Supreme Court ordered school desegregation. If the Members will recall, there was a great deal of furor, particularly in our Southern States, with reference to defiance of the Supreme Court decision. However, my sense of pride comes about because people in the South, leaders in the South, understood the necessity of not only complying with the law, but understood the morality of the Supreme Court decision.

Southern leaders faced a situation in which there was a proliferation of Robert E. Lee schools all over the South. They came into being in an effort to avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling; but men and women of true stature, men and women of goodwill understood that that was not the thing to do. In their own fashion, sometimes quietly, sometimes not quietly, that was all changed. As a result, in our Southern States there is more integration in the public schools than there is in any other place in this country.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, let me move to the next point. Anyone in this House or anyone in this country who thinks that racism is dead, who thinks that racial discrimination is dead, who thinks that racial prejudice is dead is either dumfounded or found dumb. All over this country there are evidences of the continued presence of racial discrimination.

Why in the name of God would anyone want to support the Vanik amendment? Although it is not motivated to or intended to do this, it is an amendment which will permit the proliferation of private schools, particularly in our Northern and Western States, to avoid school desegregation. Why would anyone want to permit that? That is exactly what will happen.

I know that the men and women of the South, the true leaders who solved this problem in the South, do not want that can of worms opened again—and by God, it will be opened if this amendment passes. Whether we want to admit to it or not, it becomes a mechanism, a vehicle, a means by which the desegregation which has been accomplished so well in our Southern States in particular will be undone, and it will encourage and embolden the Northern and Western States to defy the law of the land. That is not what we should be doing.

Some Members have spoken about the problems in the public schools. Of course there are problems in the public schools, but for every child that we find graduating from high school who cannot read, I can show you 10 children graduating from high school who can read, and can read well. I think what has happened is that some have taken isolated instances and blown them entirely out of proportion, and this becomes part of the smear job against the public schools.

If you really want to help the public schools; if you really care about educating all of our children, then you must understand that the Vanik amendment will do more damage to the public schools and will undo what you really want to do. I mentioned earlier that there is no doubt in my mind that if the Vanik amendment passes, more and more people are going to send their children to the private schools. If that happens, it is as true as night follows day that support for our public schools is going to diminish. We are not going to get the bond issues passed. We are not going to get the other financial undergirding required for the running of the public schools accomplished. The net result will be that this will take a bad situation and make it worse by further undercutting the public schools, and we do not want to do that.

I have a great deal of respect for CHARLIE VANIK, and if he were on the floor I would say, "Come on back home, CHARLIE; come back home to be the kind of liberal you used to be, where you would stand and fight for the rights of all people. Come back home where you did not really seek to get people divided in terms of ideological and political differences."

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. KILDEE). The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

(By unanimous consent Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Ladies and gentlemen of this House, I have said it so many times in recent months, that somehow or other there is a mood of conservatism in America. I understand that, and I know that we are representatives closest to the people, and that some of us attempt to use that as an excuse, as a justification, for merely mirroring the conservatism that is now in this country. But, I further submit to the Members that we ought to be more than that. We ought not to be here just as barometers, reflecting the winds that blow in our districts. We are here to implement the Constitution. We do not require direction from our people to stand for that which is morally right. We should not be blown like leaves in a wind because of shifting moods in this country.

I urge the Members to defeat the Vanik amendment. It is a bad amendment, with all its implications, with its unconstitutionality, with its implications of racism—and I said implications—with its implications for neglect in backing of the public schools. All of these things and more simply demand of us that we defeat the Vanik amendment.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise to speak against the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, at one point during the committee consideration of this legislation a member of the committee said that we needed to enact this legislation to save the private schools of our Nation. I would just like to rise here today to say to my colleagues that we need to save the public schools of this Nation. Our public schools are in trouble in this country, in State after State and city after city, from one coast to the other. Currently, the Federal Government is contributing less than $145 per child to the cost of public elementary and secondary education in this country.

Indeed, in my own State of Arkansas we received from the Federal Government 13 percent of the total funding for public elementary and secondary education of all of our expenditures for that purpose. We are absolutely dependent upon this financing.

Our public schools are the area where we should cast our attention and for which we should cast our votes. But if we pass this legislation we will be taking dollars away from the public school systems of our country and also be raising the most serious questions of constitutionality.

Whether we call Government aid a tax credit, a deduction, or a reimbursement, the final benefit in legislation such as this is the same. It is no defense to urge that the encouragement to sectarian schools is a relatively minor encroachment on the first amendment protection that Thomas Jefferson referred to as a wall of separation between church and state. Many times we have seen a trickling stream turn into an absolute torrent in subsequent years.

Neither should we think that merely by passing this legislation we will reduce the cost of education, nor will we strike a blow against inflation, because the effect of this legislation will be to do the opposite. The cost of tuition in private schools, whether elementary or secondary or postsecondary, will go up, the inflationary impact will go up, and the Government deficit will go up. The taxpayers of this country can afford to pay for only one school system. That should be our public system of schools.

I urge my colleagues to vote against this amendment because the Treasury cannot afford the amendment, because our Constitution does not anticipate such Federal assistance to private sectarian education, and because our public schools need the dollars this bill would siphon away from potential Federal assistance to the public schools of our country.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, during the course of this debate it has been pointed out that there are serious constitutional issues that are raised by this amendment. The indication was that we should leave this to the Court to decide. Yet, I think we have a responsibility under our sworn oath to uphold the Constitution to discuss those constitutional implications.

The first amendment makes very clear that the Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion. This is the basic tenet in the principle of separation of church and state. And so the question that must be dealt with here is: Do tax credits provided by the Federal Government to elementary and secondary education constitute an aid to religion, constitute an assistance to the establishment of religion?

There are three tests that have been proposed by the Supreme Court in dealing with that issue. Let me deal with two of those tests.

The first one is this: Is this kind of tax credit primarily going to provide aid to religious education? The fact is that in this country 87 percent of the nonpublic schools—that is 87 percent of the nonpublic schools—are religiously affiliated in one way or another. Clearly we are talking about sectarian education in those schools. The Court itself has said that the very purpose of these schools is to provide religious education. They are devoted to religious values and religious beliefs. And so surely the very purpose of these schools is to provide religious education. A tax credit provided by the Federal Government to parents sending their children to such schools is clearly aid which financially advances religious education.

The second test enunciated by the Court is this: Will the tax credit result in excessive entanglement of religion with Government? And the fact is that just administratively alone there is clearly going to be entanglement with religion in this country as a result of tax credits.

But beyond that, it is also clear that there will be political strife in this country relating to religious education as a result. And the Supreme Court in the Nyquist case admitted very clearly that as a result of these kinds of tax credits there will result decisive political consequences and there will result entanglements between religion and Government.

And so clearly under two of the three tests provided by the Supreme Court there are serious constitutional questions related to this issue.

Indeed, the Attorney General of the United States has confirmed that under two of these three tests he would find and have to argue that these provisions are unconsitutional.

Yes, we can take the position: Leave this to the Supeme Court to decide. But I think it is our responsibility under the Constitution to also clearly consider the constitutional implications of this legislation. I believe that it is clearly unconstitutional and that the amendment ought to be opposed on that basis.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PANETTA. I will be pleased to yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, I have been listening to the debate and I have a couple of questions I would like to ask in regard to contributions and in regard to church and state relationships.

If I contribute to a church which is a direct recipient of my money, then I can deduct that from my income tax, can I not?

Mr. PANETTA. That is correct.

Mr. VOLKMER. Is that a more closely related establishment of a religion or a church and the government helping it than just giving my money for tuition for a school which is operated by a church?

Mr. PANETTA. The problem with that is that the court has upheld the kind of tax exemption you discuss because these exemptions apply to contributions to all charities regardless of religious implications. In this instance, 87 percent of the schools that would receive the benefits of the tax credits are religiously affiliated and that was the basis on which the Nyquist decision found such tax credits to be unconstitutional.

Mr. VOLKMER. The next question is: If I contribute to my church and the church then uses part of that fund to operate a school, as I understand it that is tax deductible?

Mr. PANETTA. That is correct but the distinction is, again by the courts, that this applies to all charitable contributions regardless of their sectarian or nonsectarian relationship.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps this issue kind of greets me like all the issues since I have been in the Congress and that is that the advocates on both sides have probably attempted to overstate the case. However, I do oppose the Vanik amendment, at least for the present time.

As a former president of the school board of a fairly large public school system, I am not persuaded that the tuition credit for elementary and secondary education is as significant as the opponents and proponents claim. There are some who believe that tuition tax credits will be the death knell of the public school system and there are some of my people from parochial schools who believe that credits for the parochial schools will be their salvation. I think they are both wrong.

I would suggest, however, that we defeat the amendment, primarily on a pragmatic basis. I say that we first start with college tuition tax credits, which I do support. We have a sunset provision in this bill. Let us see what the economic, educational and, yes, the constitutional effects of college tuition tax credits are for the period the bill is in force, wait for the end of that period of time and then make a judgment as to whether we should extend them downwards to elementary and secondary schools. It may be that, after we see how well tax credits for college tuition works, that it can be extended. There is no question that our parochial schools are being hit by inflation in a way as severe as the public schools are.

However, we all know that once we put a provision in the tax code that it is like pulling teeth to get it out.

As my colleague from Wisconsin, Mr. STEIGER, who is very interested in, and yes, I support him in it, in reducing capital gains rates, said, in 1969 that law was adopted vastly increasing the rates of capital gains, and now it is like pulling teeth to get the law changed again.

I say that we have to make the first step in the equation, and that should be the enactment of the college tuition tax credit. I think there is some merit to giving such a tax credit to the parents who send their kids to college. Then we see what effect that credit has educationally, economically and constitutionally, because I believe there will be a constitutional test even on college credits. Then at the end of the 3-year period we can come back here and extend it downward if we decide to do so.

The gentleman from Wisconsin Mr. STEIGER says: How are people going to cope with this heavy tax burden? I believe that the real question is how are people going to cope with inflation. And that is every time the inflationary cycle comes up, people, educational institutions, every institution in this country cannot cope. Whom do they run to? They run to us: "Help us. Give us money. Give us a tax break. We need it. If we do not have it, we cannot survive."

We all realize—I am sure most people on this side of the aisle realize—that this has a pyramid effect which is inflationary itself. What I say is while there may be a need to provide that relief to parents, let us target the need pragmatically. Let us start with college credits only, see how it works, and then maybe after a 3-year period of time—and the pressure will still be on to go to elementary and secondary education—we can go there, but not now. It is premature. I urge defeat of the Vanik amendment.

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the primary focus thus far has been a discussion of whether this particular amendment would advance or inhibit public education as opposed to private education. I suggest that this is not the best focal point, and not how the issue should be framed or viewed. The issue we should be discussing is how government can best assist parents educate their children.

When we started off in these United States, we did not have a public school system. We realized at that time something that I think we have forgotten today—that the primary responsibility for the education of a child rests with the parents, and that the role of the State, of society at large, of Government, is a supportive role. It ought to support the parents in their efforts to educate and develop their children. When we started out, how did we do this? We said, Well, what we will do is, we will tax everybody, and we will also set up a school system where some might choose to send their children, if they so desired and could not afford to do the job of educating their children themselves—and we will call that the public school system.

There was some element of choice at that time, not insofar as the payment of taxes was concerned. But we started out with a basically private system where the parental role was primary and Government assistance supportive. However, we have switched gears over the past 200 years and we now have the role of the State as primary rather than supportive and secondary, almost to the point of being exclusive. I suggest that we have made a philosophical error in our thinking.

What do we do in order to help parents have a meaningful choice regarding the education of their child? At this moment, we have but one alternative before us—tuition tax credits. Regrettably, while I support this amendment, I do not think it is the best approach. I do not think tuition tax credits are the best approach at all, but we are in a box. We are in a straitjacket that has been imposed upon us not by the Constitution of the United States but by decisions of the Supreme Court that have with great strain and with virtually total inconsistency erroneously interpreted the 1st amendment and the 14th amendment.

I remember when I was in the State legislature. I coauthored a bill in 1971 that provided assistance for secular education services provided to children in private schools, and I argued it was clearly constitutional. The Supreme Court said it was unconstitutional. In 1972 I coauthored legislation providing deductions, which I argued were probably constitutional. The Supreme Court said, no, it is unconstitutional. Yet, both before that time and even since that time the decisions of the Supreme Court have been so confusing, so lacking in consistency, that the only thing any person with intellectual integrity could now say about tuition tax credits is, "We do not know." And so, in my judgment, we should try the constitutionality of tuition tax credits.

I must, however, raise a few additional points that concern me about this amendment. First of all, we will not be assisting through this amendment individuals who do not pay taxes. Second, we will be assisting individuals in the $100,000 bracket or so, and I do not think that is what Government should be doing. Third, it would be preferable to delay implementation of the tax credits for a short period, so that the issue of constitutionality could be tested.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAFALCE. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. VANIK. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

If this amendemnt is adopted, and if the second amendment is adopted raising the credit to 50 percent, I would like to point out to the gentleman that 83 percent of the benefits will go to families with incomes under $28,000.

Mr. LAFALCE. I understand that.

Mr. VANIK. That is two workers earning $14,000 each. There is nothing wealthy about that.

Mr. LAFALCE. I do not quarrel with the percentage. That is why I support it. But the fact is, we should have provided some cutoff, and that is what makes my support qualified in nature. Further, while I think there is certainly a question mark regarding the constitutionality of the gentleman's amendment, in my judgment we should pass it, and we should continue to do this until we find some constitutional way of aiding parents in having a meaningful choice in the education of their children.

I must also add that I believe that the Mikva approach, deferring payment on taxes, is more arguably constitutional than would be the tuition tax credit approach, and would also give more meaningful financial relief; so while I support the gentleman's amendment, I will also support the Mikva substitute as a preferable approach, given those two limited options.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire whether I can ask that we close debate on this amendment?

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to close debate on this amendment by 3:20 o'clock p.m.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. DANIELSON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to close debate on this amendment by 3:30 o'clock p.m.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Members standing at the time the unanimous-consent request was made will be recognized for 1 minute and 15 seconds each.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. COUGHLIN).

(By unanimous consent, Mr. STEIGER and Mr. CUNNINGHAM yielded their time to Mr. COUGHLIN.)

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, in the course of debate, and I will try not to take my entire time, I have heard so many phantoms and so many red herrings, I would like to refocus attention in the direction I think it should be focused.

We have heard comments that this amendment will be harmful to public education and create a massive exodus from the public schools. Now, I hardly think that a tuition tax credit in the amount of either 25 or 50 percent of the amount of tuition, I hardly think that kind of tuition credit is likely to cause a massive exodus from the public schools. That just will not happen.

It has been said here that this amendment would further exacerbate the problems of our public schools and, indeed, our public schools do have problems. But, my colleagues, I submit, think what will happen to the public schools if all the students from the nonpublic schools, particularly in our large cities, are dumped on those school systems. That would really exacerbate the problems of those public school systems.

Diversity of education and competition helps the public school systems; so this is not going to exacerbate the problems of public schools. It is going to help them.

It has been said this could lead to discrimination and create social problems when it has been very clear by the records from the Internal Revenue Service itself that these educational institutions must be nondiscriminatory. This amendment has nothing to do with discrimination.

Finally, it has been said that this amendment might lead to the imposition of all sorts of conditions on our private educational institutions.

Mr. Chairman, we today permit a tax deduction for contributions to private educational institutions. There are no strings that go with that; there are no problems with that; it works very smoothly. It is the same thing that we are talking about here.

We should be focusing on what we are trying to do. What we are trying to do is help people. We are trying to help middle-income people find a way to afford education for their children.

Mr. Chairman, if we focus on that question, if we focus on helping people, then we will eliminate all the red herrings and all the exacerbating problems we have gotten ourselves into.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SISK yielded his time to Mr. DANIELSON.)

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. DANIELSON).

Mr. DANIELSON. Mr. Chairman. I rise in opposition to the amendment, and I would like to state that I am also opposed to the bill itself.

I think we are making a very great mistake here today if we should vote a tax credit for tuition that is paid to private schools. There have been a lot of arguments, and I am just going to touch upon them very briefly.

It has been argued that to pass this bill, to agree to this amendment, would be to encourage segregation and nullify desegregation and the wholesome development of desegregation that has taken place in the last 20 years. That is absolutely true, and I commend the gentleman from Maryland for making the point so well.

I think it is a paradox that we should be standing here arguing in favor of something that would effectively nullify the progress that has been made in the last 24 years. There are people arguing today for tax credits who would not dare stand up and argue against desegregation.

Another point concerns the separation of church and state. I am one of those who believe that this amendment would be unconstitutional. I recognize that there is room for debate on that particular point, but the paradox again comes up. We who have taken an oath to support and defend the Constitution are sitting here arguing about ways to get around it. We should be supporting the Constitution according to its letter and according to its spirit.

The idea of trying to find some way around the Constitution, or finally to punch our way through the Constitution, is repugnant to me and runs counter to the whole idea of supporting the Constitution of the United States. Why should we erode that wholesome barrier which has been erected between church and state? A barrier which has enabled this country to preserve the greatest degree of freedom ever known to man in any country on earth, simply because we have separated these two great forces?

Mr. Chairman, let us get down to an immediate and practical argument as to why we should oppose this amendment, in addition to these other two valid reasons. I have heard up until today no candidate for office anywhere around the country saying that he is out looking for a new spending program. We do not want any more spending programs. That is what my constituents tell me, and that is what your constituents tell you, and I will tell the Members, that this is the biggest spending program to come before the 95th Congress.

Mr. Chairman, those who support this amendment say it will cost only a few million dollars. I respectfully submit that this is only the nose of the camel under the flap of the tent, and once this idea gets in, it will grow and grow and we will never be able to turn it around.

Federal aid to education did not begin until 1965, and now look at it. It has grown from its humble beginnings of a few years ago to the point where we are now spending $13,612,000,000 in direct aid to education, plus another $4,853,000,000 for indirect aid, making a total of $18,465,000,000, not counting military education programs and the like. Figures on these expenditures which I have obtained reflect as follows:

FEDERAL EDUCATION FUNDING BY CONTROL OF INSTITUTION, FISCAL YEAR 1978
[Budget Authority in millions]

	Public	Private	Total
Direct Federal Expenditures:
Elementary and secondary education	$5,691	$320	$6,011

(By unanimous consent, Mrs. FENWICK yielded her time to Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois.)

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANDERSON).

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, in the remarks that I made before this House earlier when we were under general debate, I cited some of the concerns that had been expressed to me by public school authorities in my own State of Illinois that the impact of this tuition tax credit on public education was going to be very severe.

The argument has just been made by my dear friend and colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. COUGHLIN), that this is not going to cause the kind of massive exodus from our public schools that perhaps some of us fear. Yet I want to suggest that in a day and an age when we see bond issue after bond issue going down to defeat, when we see more and more school referenda calling for increased educational tax rates being defeated all across the country, can there be any doubt in anyone's mind that this legislation is certainly going to have the effect of shrinking still further that ever diminishing base of support for our public schools that we have witnessed in recent years?

I do not think we can deny those facts, and it is for that reason that I am concerned about this amendment and will vote against it.

Mr. Chairman, I also cannot agree that this has nothing to do with racial discrimination. Recently I read the report of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission, and it states very clearly—and let me quote from it—that the Internal Revenue Service is continuing to furnish tax exemption to schools which have been barred by the Federal courts from receiving State support, because of their discriminatory conduct.

Like it or no, we have to face the unpleasant fact that if we thrust upon the Internal Revenue Service the burden of determining whether or not the private academies and the private schools of this country are truly conducting a nondiscriminatory educational policy, we are giving them a responsibility which they simply cannot discharge.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. VOLKMER yielded his time to Mr. VENTO.)

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. VENTO.)

Mr. VENTO. I rise in support of the amendment to include a limited tuition tax credit for elementary and secondary schools. The Federal Government has a long tradition of providing financial assistance for educational services to nonpublic school children through title I, school lunch, education of the handicapped, and many other programs. Enactment of the elementary and secondary tax credit is not the drastic departure from existing policy which has been claimed. What this measure can do is to equalize the Federal educational expenditure between public and nonpublic students. Currently, Federal educational spending in Saint Paul is approximately $113 per pupil enrolled in public schools and $69 per pupil enrolled in nonpublic schools. On the national level, Federal support for public and nonpublic schools reflects a similar difference. A $50 tax credit insures that all students receive equal financial support from the Federal Government. This is a goal I can support. I disagree with the tax credit for higher education and feel that the Presidential recommended scholarship is superior in that it targets the dollars into existing programs for an expanded number of Americans. I also would prefer that the cost of this total program should be incorporated into a total tax program that the Congress and administration have had such a difficult time in determining this session. This program has only clouded the tax package, we do not see the "tradeoffs"; that is, social security corporate tax cuts, individual reductions.

I will vote for the Vanik elementary and secondary tuition tax credit amendment—but really feel the format is inappropriate. I am pleased to note a expiration date, this is not an irreversible decision, we will be able to assess the impact and if its adverse to public education change it.

However, I can support this amendment only with the understanding that the financial commitment is limited and the desegregation requirements will be strictly enforced. The Federal Government cannot and must not indirectly support any school which discriminates against students because of race.

The Ways and Means Committee approved an amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. ARCHER) which effectively places responsibility for enforcement of desegregation with the Internal Revenue Service. A parent may only claim the tax credit if the school which their child attends has been granted a tax exempt status under 501c(3) of the IRS Code. I question whether this provides sufficient enforcement.

The Internal Revenue Service has had a checkered history of enforcing this provision. In 1970, the first year of their responsibility, the IRS removed the tax exempt status of 80 segregated private schools. Since that time, the IRS enforcement has become far more relaxed. They are currently the subject of a permanent Federal court order enjoining the IRS from granting or continuing the tax exempt status to private schools in Mississippi unless the IRS has affirmatively determined that the schools are operated in a nondiscriminatory manner, in respect to admissions, staff hiring, financial assistance, and they must also insure that the sponsoring organization does not support the maintenance of segregated schools.

The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights recently criticized the IRS for the lax enforcement of this 501(c)(3) desegregation requirement. The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights found that the IRS had failed to effectively enforce the legal requirements in nondiscrimination.

Because of these criticisms and the Federal court order, I have some serious questions regarding our ability to determine that this tax credit will not provide Federal assistance to segregated schools.

Mr. Chairman, at this time I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) a few questions to clarify several aspects of this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I think the question of the IRS has come into consideration in their enforcement of the nondiscrimination requirement here today, and I am seriously concerned about it, as are some of the other Members. I will not go through all of the facts. I have, really, a series of questions, in light of the present enforcement and the problems of enforcement that the IRS experiences. I might add, parenthetically, I think they experience those enforcement problems irrespective of whether or not we have this tax credit in force and effect. IRS experiences that, insofar as they qualify under the 501(c)(3) regulations. So there is a problem anyway. In light of the present enforcement problems, what assurances can be given to the Congress that these tax credits will not be used for attendance in segregated private schools? I think it is a very important question, one that bothered me and other Members.

I would like to yield to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) to respond to that.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, the Internal Revenue Service has the responsibility of insuring that schools which enjoy the status of tax-exempt organizations under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code do, in fact, comply with the requirement that they do not discriminate on the basis of race. Although some dissatisfaction has been expressed about the Service's enforcement of this requirement. I believe that the Internal Revenue Service has always regarded this duty very seriously and will be giving it greater attention in the future.

The present Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Jerome Kurtz, expressed a strong commitment to enforce the nondiscrimination rules vigorously in a recent letter to Arthur S. Fleming, Chairman of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission. In his letter, Commissioner Kurtz outlines the IRS's past efforts to insure that only schools which do not discriminate are recognized as tax-exempt organizations. Furthermore, the Commissioner describes efforts being taken within the IRS to improve its enforcement of this policy. The Service has been actively reviewing its rules and procedures in this area over the last few months. The Commissioner states that he expects that the IRS soon will propose additional guidelines to test a school's assertion of a nondiscriminatory policy. These guidelines and the Service's record in enforcement of nondiscrimination, of course, will be of interest to members of the Ways and Means Committee in fulfilling both their legislative and oversight obligations.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from Massachusetts (Mrs. HECKLER).

Mrs. HECKLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this amendment.

I would like to say that in supporting this amendment I do so primarily for two reasons. First of all, I believe it would be salutary for its effect on American education.

I come before this body as one who believes strongly in public education. I have advocated it and I have voted for its appropriations, and I will continue to do so. But in supporting public education, I never intended to create a monopoly position for public schools. I believe in pluralism, the survival of alternative academic opportunities for American citizens. If this pluralism is not protected by our actions today, we will further burden the American taxpayer to the tune of somewhere between $4 and $10 billion—the cost of an expansion of public education to accommodate those closed out of private schools. Moreover, the competitive nature of this pluralism makes a large contribution to keeping quality alive in the educational system.

Secondly, I feel that the amendment speaks to the taxpayer, to the citizen. Families with children attending nonpublic elementary and secondary schools end up paying twice for their children's education, once for the tuition and again when they pay local property taxes. They deserve and need the tax relief that this amendment will provide.

Finally the argument of constitutionality has been brought into this discussion. I believe that the Supreme Court will not find this aid unconstitutional and I offer author Walter Berns arguments in his historic account of the first amendment. The First Amendment and the Future of American Democracy. He clearly points out that the first amendment was meant to forbid the preference of one religion over another. The interpretation was left as a matter of political choice, as an issue of public policy to be resolved however we choose and as often as we as a nation wish.

The tuition tax credit applies to all nonpublic schools regardless of the denomination or religious affiliation they enjoy. Every family will benefit equally—answering a real and legitimate need of millions of Americans.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. FISHER).

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this amendment.

I would like to say three things about it. First, no matter how one looks at it, this is a serious breach in the wall of separation between church and state.

Mr. Chairman, I come from the State of George Mason and Thomas Jefferson, who were the principal architects of religious freedom in this country. It took 100 years after their time to establish a free public school system rather than a church-dominated school system.

I think separation of church and state is one of the authentic principles of this country, and we ought not to breach this wall lightly.

Mr. Chairman, some Members say that a small sum of money is involved. Yes, that is true, but a major historic principle is involved.

Keep in mind that nearly 90 percent of the elementary and secondary students, who would be aided by the bill as it now stands, are in church-sponsored schools for which a sectarian as well as an educational program is important. This is fine; God bless them. But Federal money should not be injected into such a situation in a broad-scale way.

Second, there is little financial aid here to families which are hard pressed to meet school costs. The $50, or whatever the sum, will be soon swallowed up by tuition increases, leaving these families with little or no direct relief to their budgets.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, by all means, let us recognize the problem of families beset by educational costs and let us try something at the college level where these basic principles are not so much at stake and see how it works.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas (Mr. PICKLE).

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Chairman, this is not good education policy. This is not a good tax policy. The Committee on Education and Labor ought to be determining and recommending a bill to us. The bill ought not to come through the backdoor of a tax vehicle. This is very fundamental. Yet, that is what we are considering.

Secondly, Mr. Chairman, if we adopt the Vanik amendment, we will be committing ourselves to at least $1.5 billion a year; and it will grow from now on. This is another little revenue sharing device, and we should be mindful of it; whether one is for it or against it, it is going to be very expensive.

Third, I submit that if we take this approach, we will be letting the long arm of Federal jurisdiction go out into these private schools. As one Member (Mr. JENKINS) said, that would be the end of private, non-profit education. In either event, it would extend Federal jurisdiction to private schools, directly or indirectly.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think that is what Members want just for the sake of temporary tax relief. I think the amendment should be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. MOFFETT).

Mr. MOFFETT. Mr. Chairman, there has been a lot of talk about improving education today and that this is one way to do it.

I find this a very difficult issue. I think all of us do, and we are trying to do the right thing.

When we talk about improving education for the masses, we are talking about one thing generally: public education. We cannot run away from that. We cannot hide from that fact, and we cannot hide from the fact that there are not many champions of the public school system in this body. I think that fact reflects disenchantment, very genuine disenchantment, by our constituents with the public schools. The public school system needs scrutiny. There is no question that it is not getting enough. It needs competition, and parochial schools and others give it that competition. It may even need a jolt through losing on some bond issues, as is happening all over the country, so as to try to make it shape up. However, it does not need a Jarvis Gann in the U.S. House of Representatives. That is precisely what this amendment is.

It is an amendment which is very tempting, particularly for Democrats, because we are talking about our national core constituency. When we talk about people who send their children to parochial schools. It is very tempting to vote for this amendment; but it is bad public policy.

If this amendment is passed, countless numbers of families whose children are in public schools but who are not entirely happy with those schools will make decisions to move their children to private schools. It does not matter that this is a small tax credit. Most people will not even notice that. What will get through to them is that they will get a tax break for sending their children to private schools. And it will push those who are almost prepared to make the move away from public schools over the line.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. OAKAR).

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I have taught for many years in both private and public school systems, and I have always noted that both systems have guidelines that are governed by the State. Therefore, they have very specific regulations; and that, certainly, will never change.

Mr. Chairman, I believe firmly in both systems; and I reiterate that I will always be supportive of legislation to assist the public school system.

I support the Vanik amendment, frankly, not because it aids upper middle income people, but because it will help the moderate- to middle-income people.

It is appalling to see the number of private schools closing in the inner cities, which has accounted for the further deterioration of the stability of our cities. Many parents simply cannot afford to send their children to the school of their choice. I believe it is the basic right of parents to educate their children. Let us give all parents the opportunity to educate their children in an accredited school of their choice.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. KREBS).

Mr. KREBS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to this blatantly unconstitutional amendment. I say blatantly unconstitutional because one does not have to be a constitutional lawyer to realize that this is a very serious infringement of the constitutional provision on separation of church and state.

Beyond this, I think it is very poor politics. If there is anything that the general public has been very critical of this Congress it has been the size of the Federal deficit. Certainly, by starting out a new program that has no end in sight, as has already been stated repeatedly. It represents the beginning of a major expenditure, thus clearly indicating that we are going to do nothing toward cutting the size of the Federal deficit.

Last but not least, I submit to the Members that in passing this amendment—which I hope they will not pass—they are signaling in no uncertain terms the end of public education as we know it.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, we have heard a lot of talk about the separation of church and state, and of unconstitutionality. I would just like to repeat for those who have read the bill that there is not any payment to any institution in this bill. No schools are going to get any money.

There is going to be a tax credit given to the parents who choose to have their children attend a nonpublic school. They are going to be allowed to keep some of their money. We are not going to give money back to them. They are going to keep a little when they file their income tax return.

That is what our constituents want, and that is what they told us they wanted in the last Harris poll, which showed a greater than 2-to-1 majority favoring tuition tax credits. Let us give those people who are willing to make a sacrifice a chance to have a choice of where they are going to educate their children for a few more years at least. It will not hurt the public education system, but it will do wonders for those people who are paying for two systems.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment has been heavily debated in this very body just 4 weeks ago. At that time, we adopted the Luken substitute to the first concurrent budget resolution for fiscal year 1979. I might remind the Members that the Luken amendment specifically included sufficient funds to be set aside for nonpublic elementary and secondary children and colllege students at a level of $635 million.

In spite of the heavily waged campaign by those representing some of our public institutions I am convinced that those Members who supported the budget resolution amendment will, again, give their full support for the Vanik amendment.

I might add that outside of this body, this amendment not only has the support of the Federation of Catholic Teachers and the U.S. Catholic Conference, but it is also supported by the Council for American Private Education, the National Association of Private Schools for Exceptional Children (meaning handicapped), the National Taxpayers Union, the National Society for Hebrew Day Schools, Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod, Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), Christians for Better Government (predominately Baptist), Agudath Israel of America, Citizens for Educational Freedom, and Christian School Action, Inc.—to name a few of the larger groups who you have probably heard from by this time. These were not groups formed for the express purpose of supporting tuition tax credits, these groups have been in existence for decades.

The real base of support for the Vanik amendment, however, is not these national groups, but individual constituents, the grassroots, the moms and dads. The Harris poll, for instance, found that these just plain folks by a majority of 63 to 28 percent feel that the concept of the Vanik amendment will be "a way to get some tax relief to parents who send their children to private and parochial schools and have not been able to get any federal aid up to now."

What the Vanik amendment does is offer us an opportunity to provide some limited relief to parents, who have for years, been doubly burdened by educational expenses; first by virtue of their property taxes, and second, by paying tuition to nonpublic schools—while at the same time, relieving the public system of the cost of educating their children.

This amendment will help to retain educational freedom of choice which is rapidly eroding under the dual pressures of rising educational costs and increasing taxes. Many low- and middle-income parents can no longer bear the very heavy financial burden of nonpublic education. This has caused an overall decline in the proportion of students enrolled in nonpublic schools from 13 percent in 1966 to only 9.8 percent in 1976. A tuition tax credit would allow those parents who have chosen nonpublic education for their families to be able to continue exercising that choice in our dual educational system.

The enactment of tuition tax credits for nonpublic elementary and secondary school student will help to maintain the current balance between public (90.2 percent) and private (9.8 percent) elementary and secondary school enrollment—not alter it. The President's Commission on School Finance in a 1972 study, estimated that if many nonpublic schools closed, capital costs for public schools would increase from $4.7 to $10 billion. During the past decade, the total number of nonpublic schools declined from 19,946 to 17,950. This represents a loss of 10 percent or nearly 2,000 schools. Any further erosion in the nonpublic school system would seriously weaken our dual educational system and create a lopsided balance away from individual choices and toward governmental control.

Far from damaging public education, tax credits will prove to be a positive help to public schools. Actually, support for the public school system is strongest in States and communities where private education is strongest. For example, in the five States where the largest percentage of students are enrolled in private schools, public school expenditures (per pupil) average $800 more than in the five States where private schools account for the smallest fraction of total enrollments.

The Vanik amendment would not result in coaxing students from public education into private education. We can draw relative conclusions from our experience at the college level, during the past years that Federal loans and grants have been made available to students in both public and private colleges. Public colleges still enroll about 78 percent of the college-age enrollment as they did prior to the era of grants and loans.

Federal support for public education will not decline with the passage of tuition tax credits. According to the National Center for Education Statistics, approximately $96 billion was spent on public education from kindergarten through graduate school in 1976–77, from local, State, and Federal taxation. Tax credits will not cause any decrease in public support of education, now or in the future.

The supporters of this amendment, many of whom have children in nonpublic elementary and secondary schools, are not wealthy. An overwhelming majority of children who attend nonpublic elementary and secondary schools come from low and middle income families. In fact, 51.4 percent of these families have incomes below $15,000. More than 71 percent have family incomes below $25,000 and fewer than 4 percent have incomes over $50,000. Around 40 percent of the enrollment in one Chicago school currently receive AFDC or some other form of welfare assistance. These are the kinds of families we are helping to maintain their educational choices.

The Vanik amendment has been carefully designed to insure that it will not result in a mass exodus from the public school system to the private system. The maximum amount of the credit will be limited to $50 in 1978 and $100 in 1979 and 1980. The credit would be available only to parents whose children are enrolled in schools that are nonprofit and nondiscriminatory institutions. The credit would simply allow parents the opportunity to keep a few more of their own tax dollars when they file their return for the previous year.

The additional cost of adding the Vanik amendment to H.R. 12050 will result in a minimal revenue loss of $9 million in fiscal year 1978, $218 million in fiscal year 1979, $354 million in fiscal year 1980 and $310 million in fiscal year 1981, if the bill remains at the 25 percent level. At the 50 percent level, the additional revenue loss will be $11 million in fiscal year 1978, $285 million in fiscal year 1979, $461 million in fiscal year 1980, and $394 million in fiscal year 1981. These figures are based on estimates supplied by the Joint Committee on Taxation.

Tuition tax credits will not foster racial segregation as many of the opponents have claimed. In fact, for a private elementary and secondary school to attain and keep a tax-exempt status, it must satisfy the Internal Revenue Service that it does not discriminate. There are established procedures for auditing compliance with these requirements and for investigating complaints. At this point, I would like to refer my colleagues to my statement in the RECORD of May 26, 1978, page 15732. This statement contains correspondence between Senator MOYNIHAN and IRS Commissioner Kurtz on the nondiscriminatory provisions included in the Vanik amendment. Commissioner Kurtz stated that—

> The Service does not believe there is a need for additional statutory support of the Service's position that private schools exempt under Section 501(c)(3) may not discriminate on racial grounds. . . .

Many minority students form a substantial share of private school enrollment. In the city of Chicago, 55 percent of all the youngsters in Catholic schools are black—40 percent of these same children are even non-Catholic. In the city of New York, 60 percent of all students in Catholic schools are minorities. According to a recent survey of parochial schools in the 10 largest cities of our country, Catholic schools are already doing much of the educating of the very poor in the ghettos. Ethnic minority students comprised 16 percent of the total Catholic school enrollment in school year 1976–77. In other words, the poor and minorities are already choosing nonpublic education at their own expense.

Opponents of tuition tax credits have argued that by extending the tax credit advantages to the elementary and secondary students, it may be considered unconstitutional by the U.S. Supreme Court. In the opinion of the constitutional experts, with whom I and many of my cosponsors have counseled, such a provision is not contrary to the principles of our Constitution. Tuition tax credit legislation, as introduced at the Federal level, differs in many significant respects from the State programs on which the U.S. Supreme Court has previously ruled. When such legislation is enacted, the Court will, of course, have the opportunity to review it.

Finally, in an address on November 29, 1977, U.S. Commissioner of Education, Ernest L. Boyer, stated that—

> Private education is absolutely crucial to the vitality of this Nation, and public policy should strengthen rather than deminish these essential institutions.

The amendment would, in the face of declining enrollments, provide for the educational consumer some semblance of freedom of choice that the consumer has had over the years under our American system. The rising costs of education now denies the consumer that choice and I would like to provide it a little longer. I urge my colleagues to support the Vanik amendment.

Mr. Chairman, Secretary Califano testified before the Ways and Means Committee on February 14, 1978, to the following:

> The per pupil amount that we provide for public school children in this country is $128 from the Federal Government, the per pupil amount we estimate we provide for private school children in about $50 to $70. If you give $250 to every parochial schoolchild and every private schoolchild in this country, you will be giving twice as much to the private schoolchildren from the Federal Government as you give to public schoolchildren. If you add the $50 to $70 they are already getting under Federal programs you will be giving between $300 and $320 in Federal funds to each private and parochial school student in this country, and giving $128 in Federal funds on a per pupil basic to public school students.

The Secretary's guesstimates were incorrect. By contrast, the Education and Labor Committee's minority counsel conservatively estimated that the per pupil Federal support for public elementary and secondary education is closer to $140—$155 for fiscal year 1978.

Mr. Califano will find it difficult to produce any authenticated evidence to support his statements concerning Federal support to private students, because the U.S. Office of Education has no substantive management system which can provide accurate data on the extent of the participation of private (and public) school children in any of the Federal educational programs. No bureau of division in the U.S. Office of Education has a program report form which retrieves information about the actual number of program participants, either public or private; nor does any Office of Education report form retrieve information as to the per public expenditure for public or private schoolchildren participating in any single program. In short, there are no reliable resource documents at the U.S. Office of Education to support Mr. Califano's assumptions on the amount of Federal aid going to nonpublic schools. When I learned how Secretary Califano makes his calculations on Federal private aid, I was dumfounded.

To set the record straight, a typical nonpublic school is located in the nearby diocese of Arlington, Va. There, in fiscal year 1977, nearly 12,000 pupils receive a total of less than $26,000 in Federal assistance which is a little more than $2 per pupil. Even a diocese with a heavy concentration of inner-city schools is far below the Califano estimates. For example, in the archdiocese of Washington, D.C., in fiscal year 1977 the nearly 40,000 students received a total of approximately $1.35 million in Federal aid ($520,000 for title I, $600,000 in ESAA, and $215,000 in other Federal aid). This is an average of approximately $34 per pupil or nearly one-half of the $50 to $70 Califano estimated.

Secretary Califano did not provide a breakdown on his calculations made for public school children, but the calculations I have received were determined in the following manner: The committee counsel estimated that in fiscal year 1978, between 6 and 6.7 billion Federal dollars can be calculated as being direct aid to elementary and secondary education. This total does not include such items as evaluation and study; State administration money; grants to State agencies; advisory councils, information clearinghouse, model studies, educational broadcasting facilities; construction; preschool incentive grants; educational TV programing; and adult education under the Vocational Education Act, to name a few. Taking the $6 to $6.7 billion and dividing it by 43.7 million public students (based on fall 1977 projections), one determines that the total Federal dollar spending on public elementary and secondary pupils is appproximately $140 to $155 per child.

If we add to that the Federal income tax deduction for the portion of State and local property taxes devoted to public schools (based on a CRS study) of $114.23 per pupil, the total Federal spending per elementary and secondary public pupil is about $254.23 to $269.23.

We can easily compare the average $260 per pupil Federal expenditure with the maximum cost of the Vanik amendment to enable nonpublic elementary and secondary students to be eligible for the tax credit. At a 50 percent credit the highest cost of the Vanik amendment will be $461 million in 1980 for nonpublic elementary and secondary children only. By simply dividing this amount by the number of nonpublic elementary and secondary children, estimated to be 5.3 million, we arrive at an average per pupil Federal cost of $86.98.

For a fair comparison, however, it is reasonable to add the total tax expenditure for deductions for charitable contributions to education. The Ways and Means Committee staff estimates that the total tax expenditure for deductions for charitable contributions to education, primarily postsecondary is $860 million and to other nonhealth is $5,430 million. Generously assuming that 10 percent ($629 million) goes to private elementary and secondary schools, we can divide by the number of these pupils (5.3 million) which works out to $118.67 per pupil. Thus, adding $118.67 to $86.98 totals $205.65 per private pupil Federal expenditure. If we than add to the $205.65 the maximum Federal dollar contributed to the Archdiocese of Washington ($34) we can conclude that the absolute maximum the Federal Government would spend for nonpublic elementary and secondary pupils would be $239.65 as compared to the conservative estimate of $260 for public elementary and secondary students. Obviously, Secretary Califano miscalculated.

It is my understanding that Secretary Califano's calculations for the Federal support to private elementary and secondary students ($50 to $70) was made in the following manner: The Secretary asked all his program heads to estimate the number of children attending private schools who would benefit in any way from Federal dollars. The total arrived at, after a number of attempts, was 225,000 students based on 1980 projections. These 225,000 students were then multiplied by the average per pupil cost for public school children ($1,581) arriving at some $355,725,000. The dollar amount was then divided by the 5.3 million students attending private schools to total $67.11. At which, the Secretary concluded that $50 to $70 was the Federal dollar spent per private school child in the current year. I am sure my colleagues can understand the type of unreasonable and unbelievable calculations coming from our Secretary of HEW.

Many of the figures the Secretary uses in the above calculations were somewhat different in his testimony before the House Subcommittee on Elementary, Secondary, and Vocational Education on February 28, 1978. The Secretary stated that—

> We estimate that private school students will receive between $100 million and $250 million out of $6.9 billion requested for Federal elementary and secondary programs.

During his testimony, Mr. Califano frequently relied on a research report from the National Institute of Education (Compensatory Education Services, July 31, 1977), but omitted the report's findings that only 43 percent of title I districts with nonpublic school students are providing title I services to any of these pupils and second, title I funded compensatory services are provided to 116,218 nonpublic school children. This represents an estimated 4 percent of the nonpublic school students living in title I districts.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. FORD).

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of Michigan. I yield to the the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Vanik amendment to extend tuition tax credits to private elementary and secondary schools. As a cosponsor of other tuition tax credit legislation, I feel compelled to explain why I no longer support tuition tax credits such as those provided in this amendment.

The concept of a Federal tax credit for tuition paid is a difficult one not to support at first blush. As a matter of fact, a majority of us in the House were sufficiently convinced that tuition tax credits were worthwhile that we cosponsored some form of tax credit legislation. It was this apparent widespread support and potential House floor consideration that for the first time really brought tuition tax credits under close scrutiny by the Congress, the executive branch, the press and the education community. I contend that, under all objective standards, tuition tax credits have failed the test of open public debate and intense statistical and legal review.

Tuition tax credits were portrayed as administratively simple; they are not. More than just a one-line entry on a tax form will be necessary, including increased IRS personnel, additional tax form schedules, and changes to the tax code.

We were told that tax credits for private elementary and secondary school tuition would be constitutional; the Justice Department says they probably are not. In a memorandum for the Attorney General, the Assistant Attorney General stated that tuition credits for nonpublic elementary and secondary education appear to violate the first amendment guarantee against the establishment of religion. If tax credit legislation were enacted, the undoubtable result would be extended litigation and divisive national controversy.

I believe that we must be extremely careful that we do not take any action that may infringe on the very basic doctrine of separation of church and state. This Nation was founded on the principle that the state would not interfere with the religious freedoms of its citizens, in marked contrast to what was then and is now occurring in other countries of the world. To force taxpayers of another faith to bear additional tax burdens so that my child can attend by my choice a sectarian school of my faith of questionable constitutionality.

Proponents of tuition tax credits contend that the value of educational diversity justifies more direct Federal support to private schools. I agree there is value in diversity. There is also value in the public school systems which need stronger Federal help to fulfill their public responsibility. A student surrounded by other students of the same ethnic, religious, social, racial, or economic group may not learn to appreciate the diversity that exists in society as well as one in the more diverse population of a public school.

Some people will argue that it is unfair to make people pay for public schools through taxes and then pay again through tuition for private schools. I feel that, because sending a child to private school is voluntary, it is more unfair for taxpayers to be required to pay taxes for public schools and then again to subsidize private schools through tuition tax credits.

Advocates of this bill say that segregated private schools will not be one of the results of tuition tax credits because only parents who send their children to tax-exempt organizations under the Internal Revenue Code would be eligible for the credit. Unfortunately, according to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, the Internal Revenue Service has failed to carry out effectively its civil rights enforcement responsibilities, therefore many segregated private schools are now tax-exempt. Thus, the Commission opposes tax credits for nonpublic elementary and secondary school tuitions "on the grounds that it would unconstitutionally subsidize segregated private schools which have been established to circumvent the desegregation of public schools required by Brown against Board of Education."

A recent New York Times editorial noted that tuition tax credits "would distribute too much money in too small amounts too widely." This observation is right on target. The bill is very costly and will undoubtably impact congressional funding support of other vital education programs. Also, it is unlikely that a credit of $50 or $100 will substantially help parents sending their children to private schools, and it may, in fact, only serve to encourage the schools to raise their tuition by the same amount. Finally, the bill allows credits regardless of need—20 percent of the benefits would go to 5 percent of the taxpayers, those earning over $30,000.

At the elementary and secondary level, the primary purpose of Federal aid is and should remain to help States in providing public education. Later today we will consider the reauthorization of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act. In titles I and IV of this act, some support is already provided to students in private schools through compensatory programs, diagnostic services, books, and other instructional materials.

As long as it is constitutional, I will continue to support such provisions, but I will not support legislation which is detrimental to Federal support for public education. Tuition tax credits for nonpublic elementary and secondary education would almost certainly have such an effect.

Tax relief must be provided through major tax reform, something of which I have long advocated. I am cosponsor of a bill which significantly reduces Federal personal and corporate taxes. It would allow taxpayers to retain more of their earnings and thereby give them a real opportunity to choose to what type of school they want to send their children. I hope my colleagues will not be convinced that H.R. 12050 or this amendment will provide real tax relief to American families. I believe it is a mere placebo, fraught with many legal, funding, and educational problems. I therefore urge you to oppose the amendment.

Mrs. SPELLMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the genleman yield?

Mr. FORD of Michigan. I yield to the gentlewoman from Maryland.

Mrs. SPELLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot recall, in my over 16 years of public service, a more difficult question—one which required any more soul-seaching on my part than this matter of tuition tax credits for private elementary and secondary education. It is particularly difficult for me to cast this vote because I am deeply, philosophically and intellectually, committed to the concept of helping families help children to learn. As far back as the days when I served in the PTA's and taught in the classroom, I voiced the belief that institutional lines should not prevent children from experiencing the whole spectrum of educational opportunities. I believed then, as I do now, that those families which bear the double burden—taxes to educate the children of others and tuition payments to educate their own children—deserve relief.

Every Member of this House, I am certain, has received many letters on the subject. In my case, the mail and phone calls have just about broken even on each side of the question. Both sides have very convincing arguments concerning the merits or demerits of the issue. Most of them are well taken, but the question of unconstitutionality, I feel, is unfounded. And the view that public education would suffer with the advent of tuition tax credits for private elementary and secondary institutions is unjustified. Surely, no one can really believe that the Congress will foresake the public schools.

As I traveled about my district, meeting with constituents, attending public meetings, I solicited the opinions of parents whose children were in private schools. I called the superintendents of many institutions. The facts I gathered convinced me that the benefits, which I had believed parents would derive from the message of the Vanik amendment would immediately be lost—lost, because the private institutions, long suffering from increased costs and dwindling revenues, appear, for the most part, to be planning to raise tuition costs in amounts equalling the amount of the tax credits.

In addition to my contacting parents and heads of the educational facilities, I asked for an economic impact study to determine the cost of the amendment. It is estimated that adding elementary and secondary schools to the tax credit provisions would cost $9 million in fiscal year 1978, $218 million in fiscal year 1979, $354 million in fiscal year 1980, and $310 million in fiscal year 1981.

Obviously, with such expenditures, individual income taxes would have to be raised so that the funding of our public school system would not be jeopardized. I finally came to the conclusion that should the Vanik proposal become a reality, a unique situation will develop—the very people we hope to assist by granting tax relief, may instead be penalized both by increased cost of tuition plus by an increase in personal income taxes.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, despite the fact that my heart tells me to vote in favor of the Vanik amendment, I intend to follow the dictates of my head and vote in opposition.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK).

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VANIK. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, my votes today on the Vanik amendment to provide a tuition tax credit for parents of children in private elementary and secondary schools, and on H.R. 12050 to provide such a credit for college tuition, required much thought and consideration. Because of the concern of my constituents for these proposals, the severe problems they were intended to address, and the importance of the issues. I believe I should explain why I will vote as I do.

My decision to support the Vanik elementary and secondary amendment was one of the most difficult decisions I have made while in Congress over the course of two terms, both politically and on the merits of the bill. I spent many hours meeting with individuals and group representatives on both sides of the question, as well as additional hours studying arguments, analyses, court decisions, and legal opinions of constitutional authorities. I also sought expert advice on aspects of the matter which required further clarity. After this study and extensive thought, the scales nearly balanced "pro" and "con," and the decision was one of great anguish.

Let me return to the Vanik amendment in a moment.

I will vote against final passage of H.R. 12050, because most of the tax expenditure would have gone to those at the college level, and I believe it is quite evident that tax credits are not what these students need most. Compared to the high cost of college education, a several hundred dollar credit is insignificant, but in the aggregate, extraordinarily expensive to the Nation's taxpayers. Congressman WILLIAM STEIGER and I have introduced legislation reforming the guaranteed student loan program in a manner I am confident will expand lending, increase accessibility to loans, and assure the sufficiency of each loan to meet the costs of rising tuitions.

Our bill avoids the pitfall of pushing tuitions artifically still higher, which I believe a tax credit would do—eliminating any net advantage to those who pay tuition. Solving the temporary liquidity problems of college students with bright futures who are prepared to take responsibility for their education is much more sensible than doling out money without regard to need or to any actual effectiveness in helping students bear the high cost of college. The Maguire-Steiger approach is much less of a drain on the Federal Treasury, but it accomplishes the objective of assisting students and their families quite nicely. The Mikva substitute, which I will support, has some of the same advantageous characteristics as the Maguire-Steiger proposal.

To my mind, the Vanik amendment is far more attractive on the merits than the college tax credit proposed in H.R. 12050. A modest credit which would provide very little relief against a $4,000 or $8,000 college tuition, would be of considerable help to a family paying $400 or $800 per year per child at a parochial school. Moreover, I believe the vitality of private elementary and secondary school systems is an indispensable part of education in the United States. I have long been convinced that selection of private schools is a right, and should be a true practical option. Private and parochial schools have for more than 100 years afforded quality education for millions of Americans. The financial burden that parents have had to bear to pay for this education has become very great, indeed, and I am committed to searching for proper ways to help alleviate that burden.

In addition, in areas of New Jersey, as in other States, some parents believe with justification that private schools are the only option to provide high quality education for their children. This is not an academic point to them, or one subsumed by grand theories of government or public philosophy. This is simply a fact, and they will do anything to see that their children are properly educated. None of us would want to do less for our children.

Further, I am persuaded that the primary purpose of most private schools is basic education, and not the promotion of religion. And I doubt a tuition tax credit of the level we considered would devastate public education as some have claimed.

But there are several matters that disturb me very deeply about the Vanik approach.

First, it would violate principles of taxation to which I have consistently subscribed and which I have pursued legislatively, both in the "easy" cases, and in more difficult ones.

Second, the Vanik proposal may well be found unconstitutional by the courts.

Third, the proposal does not reach its targets equitably, and may not help many financially hard-pressed families at all.

On the first issue, I strongly believe the Federal tax system should not be used to achieve each and every social end. The tax system exists to collect revenue to pay the costs of Government. Those people with like income should pay like taxes, or the equity of the system, and the principle of fairness upon which voluntary compliance relies, is undermined. I have been proud that two tax reform groups have given me the highest marks for having been consistent in voting to simplify and reform the tax code.

Exceptions to this principle should be rare. Experience shows that Congress rarely reviews the efficiency or need for continuing tax subsidies which is why our tax code is riddled with loopholes and special privileges for the few. Thus, I am much more inclined to support clearly defined budget line items than tax expenditures to accomplish worthwhile policy objectives. And I note that the Federal Government provides several direct programs or subsidies to private school systems, including lunches, transportation, textbooks, and assistance under title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act. I believe that in many cases these efforts should be expanded since they will help minimize further increases in tuition, which must come from tight family budgets.

The second question of constitutionality is even more troublesome, for if we in Congress cannot conclude that a measure before us complies or may be found to comply, with the highest law in the land, I believe we are obligated (some would say we are obligated by our oath of office) not to support it. Personal preferences or the popular will are not sufficient to overcome constitutional tests.

Alexander Hamilton, in the Federalist Papers, advised that—

> It is not to be inferred . . . that the representatives of the people, whenever a momentary inclination happens to lay hold of a majority of their constituents incompatible with the provisions in the existing Constitution would, on that account, be justifiable in a violation of those provisions.

This places a heavy and sometimes uncomfortable political responsibility on the Congress.

There should be no mistake: The Vanik measure may suffer from constitutional liabilities that were summarized in an opinion of the Attorney General and endorsed by many constitutional scholars. The Supreme Court has interpreted the principles involved in the recent Nyquist decision, and these principles have evolved through a series of court decisions. It would be a cruel deception if, out of political expediency, we rationalize away constitutional problems; it would be unfair and unwise to pretend that through tuition tax credits legislation we are doing something for private elementary and secondary schools, if in fact we are not.

The third problem I have with the Vanik approach is that the benefits are not well targeted; indeed, they may not reach many or most of those for whom they are intended.

First, they are distributed equally to millionaries and to those of middle or modest income who are genuinely economically hard pressed. Why should our approach to distributing assistance be completely unadjusted to degrees of need?

Second, even where the credit does at first reach its intended target—parents of middle or modest income on tight budgets who want to choose private education for their children—it may not stay with those for long. Many authorities on the economics of private education contend that private schools would increase tution as soon as tax credits are available to parents, thereby absorbing the income Congress intended to help families afford broader choices. While this might help some strapped private school systems, it would not help the taxpayers who want and need aid most.

Finally, the Vanik measure, while benefiting millionaires and middle-class citizens equally, would do nothing for the very poor who still cannot afford the additional costs of private education or who have little or no tax liability and, therefore, are not advantaged by a credit which is not refundable. Many of these people are the same ones who are already effectively denied access to private schools, even where such schools are best suited to the needs of their children. Also, they frequently live in depressed areas with poor public school systems where private, but expensive, education is the only practical option—but their children still cannot afford to attend.

Yet, I am deeply sympathetic to the point made by many parents that they are paying twice for their children's education since they pay both tuitions to private schools—exercising their right to choose—and property taxes supporting public schools. True, many others, people with no children or whose children graduated long ago, pay property taxes without receiving an education. This is because we believe everyone benefits, directly or indirectly, from the availability of public education in our communities, and that everyone should therefore share the cost.

But a key question still remains: Are people being treated fairly under our present education financing and Federal, State, and local tax systems if they choose to send their children to a private school? I think the answer is that very often they are not.

Consider the following facts: A significant number of dollars are saved—and people therefore do not pay taxes to support—children who do not go to public schools, because their families have chosen private schools for them. This is a tax advantage for those who pay only for public education as opposed to those who pay for both public and private education. Second, those families who pay also for private education not only pay that second time but actually pay taxes as well on the income that is devoted to private school tuitions. By contrast, those who pay local taxes only for public education can write those taxes off as deductions on their Federal income taxes—again achieving advantages under existing tax law relative to those who pay for both public and private education.

Is not such a tax situation one which deserves some adjustment if fairness is the criterion?

Of course, there are other serious issues—which some believe preclude an analysis on grounds of fairness alone. Constitutionality is an important one.

I have reviewed the constitutional arguments. As I have said, I believe a case can be made that if past precedents are controlling, the Vanik proposal may well be found unconstitutional. I think the argument that the precedents themselves are well founded is more questionable.

For example, a key principle enunciated by the courts is that the establishment of religion must not be the legislation's "primary or principal effect." If education is the principal or primary purpose or effect of private schools—which I think, particularly these days, it is even for parochial schools—then religion is a secondary purpose or effect—unless the courts are willing to entertain a multiplicity of "primary" effects, which is at best a tenuous strategy and subject at the very least to reinterpretation.

Secondly, the "entanglement" criterion, another key principle enunciated by the courts, appears to depend heavily on the notion that we do not want to stimulate "divisiveness" in the body politic on such a sensitive issue as assistance to those who choose private parochial education. I am not at all sure such a principle deserves the weight of constitutional significance, even if it has been so employed in the past. Surely what we are looking for is fidelity to the Constitution itself, that is the establishment of religion principle, and balance and fairness in interpreting that—not avoiding divisiveness for the sake of avoiding it. Divisiveness is an inherent characteristic of our society and our political system and of political debate which we accept and draw strength from in many other instances. Because it may be difficult to balance out the equities with respect to support for education, does not automatically mean to me that we should sidestep the effort.

In addition, I have some difficulty accepting the theory that there is an absolute constitutional barrier of some sort between what is permissible for primary and secondary education, on the one hand, and higher education on the other. If tax credits, with all these weaknesses, are acceptable for students attending public or private institution of higher education—if we can take tax dollars to assist those who are making an optional, voluntary choice as adults to further pursue their education even at a private or sectarian institution—then then why should we not be able to assist those whose families choose to exercise an option during the early years in which there is no choice about whether or not to pursue an education? That elementary and secondary education is mandated seems to me to be an argument not against, but in favor of finding some sort of assistance to all fair, appropriate, and constitutional.

Some contend that a tuition tax credit for private elementary and secondary schools students will irreparably damage public education. I would say this: Whatever problems there are in public education, we will not be saved from them by rejecting tuition tax credits; nor will we be defeated by them simply because we do allow a modest tuition tax credit.

Some argue that economic and racial segregation will be further encouraged by tuition tax credits. I would say that the concern is a very real one, but that the credits are modest enough to help parents some without engendering significant shifts of students populations from public to private schools. Moreover, many private schools, especially those in our inner cities, serve needy populations without respect to race, religion, or economic status and sometimes with less economic or racial segregation than is characteristic of public schools in the same areas.

Finally, if we are going to have legislation on tuition tax credits I think it would be a shame to have it for colleges, where it manifestly will be of little help, and not have it for precollege, where it could be a significant help.

Let us test the matter in the courts. Let us see if a balanced assistance program can be devised over the next few years which will be fair to individuals (including a refundable provision to reach the poorest citizens and a phase-out to exclude the richest) and not be detrimental to either public or private schools. If not, then such a program need not be renewed.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. BIAGGI).

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Chairman, we have come to the heart of the tuition tax credit issue with the Vanik amendment. The issue is simple—do we extend this tax credit to the parents of children attending nonpublic elementary and secondary schools? Our decision is one which must be based on our inherent sense of justice and belief in equal opportunity. If we employ these principles into our thinking, the result will be a vote in support of the gentleman's amendment.

I have watched this issue progress and develop, witnessing a tremendous and genuine outpouring of personal interest and support for relief of this kind now. Parents of children in nonpublic elementary and secondary schools have long been victimized by a double-edged economic sword. They have been forced to pay constantly rising tuition costs for the schools their children attend while also paying constantly increasing taxes to support public schools which their children do not attend. The result, economic chaos in many American homes today. When a child's education becomes too expensive something is wrong. When cost deprives a parent from sending his child to the school of his or her choice we have failed as a society.

Simply put, the failure to enact this amendment will be disastrous to the future of private education in this Nation. During the past 10 years we have seen a severe decline in both the numbers of private schools and students enrolled. It is serious, and unless relief is provided it will only grow worse.

This is a most critical vote. It is a vote for the preservation of choice in American education. It is a vote which respects the fact that the goal we seek is quality eduation. It is a vote which will provide the kind of meaningful tax relief which lower and middle income Americans so desperately need.

I commend the sponsor of this amendment, Mr. VANIK. But I also wish to pay my respects to the real inspiration behind this amendment, the dean of the New York delegation, Mr. DELANEY, whose work and commitment to this issue is renowned in this Congress and Nation.

I have had my children educated in nonpublic schools and I am proud of the results. I was fortunate enough to have the opportunity to send my children to these schools. Thousands of other parents today do not have this same opportunity. It is to the correction of this inequity that we address ourselves today with the Vanik amendment. It deserves passage. It enhances the bill. It solidifies our commitment to the pursuit of justice and equal opportunity in America.

I would like to address one particular argument which has been offered against this amendment. It is that the proposal is discriminatory, that it will only benefit the well to do, that it will do nothing to help minority students. Facts, Mr. Chairman, repudiate this argument. In my home city of New York of some 18,000 students enrolled in schools run by the New York Catholic Archdiocese, 78 percent are from minority groups. In just the Bronx, of some 10,000 elementary school students, some 29 percent are Hispanic and 15 percent are black. There are similar figures for the city of Philadelphia.

Let me conclude with an observation. What is the alternative? One is currently being proposed to the voters in California in the form of proposition 13. This proposal which slashes property taxes to 1 percent of market assessed value is a response to a taxpayers revolt which has erupted in the State. People are incensed over the drastic increases in property taxes which are used in part to finance public education. What will Jarvis mean—the State will endure a major reduction in revenues which will have to be made up by cutting vital social and human services. Must we wait for a national taxpayers revolt before we act. I say no. We have the chance to act now in a reasonable and rational fashion. And I suggest we do so today and vote for the Vanik amendment.

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Chairman, we have before us a bill which has generated much controversy. Some of us will differ as to the merits of a modest tuition tax credit and the wisdom of extending the credit to cover expenses at private elementary and secondary schools. However, I sincerely hope a clear majority can agree that it would be unwise to increase the portion of tuition eligible for a credit from 25 to 50 percent.

I oppose this amendment because it would be very damaging and unfair to private colleges at a time when many of them are struggling to survive. Contrary to popular belief, raising the tax credit from 25 to 50 percent will hurt private colleges, not help them. Let me illustrate the negative impact of this amendment with a hypothetical example.

Suppose the tuition for a private college is currently $3,000, six times higher than the cost of being a full-time student at a public university in the same State, where tuition is $500. Assuming these costs remain the same through 1980, a 25-percent tuition tax credit with a ceiling of $250 will bring the cost of tuition at the private college down to $2,750 and the cost of tuition at the public university down to $375. The result is that instead of tuition at the private college being six times higher than at the public university, it will be more than seven times higher. The tax credit would significantly increase the relative cost of attending a private college when compared with the cost of attending a public university.

You can see that a 25-percent tuition tax credit places State universities with lower tuition at a distinct advantage over smaller private colleges, although it can be argued that parents might send a child to a private college so as to get the full $250 maximum credit.

However, if a blanket 50-percent tuition tax credit is approved, the balance would tip in even greater favor to State universities, and could prove disastrous to private colleges. Picking up my earlier example, a 50-percent credit with a $250 ceiling would bring the net tuition cost at the public university down from $500 to $250. Net tuition at the private college would remain at $2,750, even with the 50-percent credit, because of the $250 maximum. It would now cost 11 times as much to attend the private college instead of the State university. Put another way, a 50-percent tax credit up to a maximum of $250 would reduce the tuition expenses for a student attending the public university by half in contrast with an 8-percent reduction for a student attending the private college.

Consider for a moment the crisis confronting small private colleges in the years ahead. They are already strapped with increased operating costs due to inflation. Even worse, they are staring declining enrollments in the face as the number of 18- to 22-year-old Americans declines in the 1980's. If this amendment is adopted we would be compounding the grave problems of private colleges at a time when they are already at a comparative disadvantage in attracting new students. I urge rejection of this amendment. To do otherwise would be adding insult to injury for the many private colleges which have upheld the traditions of academic excellence for many years.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, this has been a very useful and informative debate. I think we have really gone over all aspects of the amendment, and I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK).

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. VANIK

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VANIK: Page 2, line 5, strike out "25 percent" and insert in lieu thereof "50 percent".

Page 8, strike out lines 9 through 13 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "taxable year."

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, in the original bill considered by the Committee on Ways and Means the tuition credit was fixed at 50 percent of the tuition. The Committee on Ways and Means in its action reduced that 50 percent to 25 percent.

The purpose of this amendment is to restore the original language of the bill. It increases the credit to 50 percent of the tuition. That would be the limitation of the credit, the $100 limitation on the full credit would still apply .

Mr. Chairman, this amendment would increase the aid provided by the post-secondary credit for fiscal year 1978 by $22 million, for fiscal year 1979 by $541 million, for fiscal year 1980 by $954 million, and for fiscal year 1981 by $1,175 million.

The cost of the 50-percent credit for elementary and secondary school tuition would be $11 million in 1978, $285 million in fiscal year 1979, $461 million in fiscal year 1980, and $394 million in fiscal year 1981.

The total cost of the 50-percent credit at all levels, including the post-secondary and elementary and secondary, would be $33 million in fiscal year 1978, $826 million in fiscal year 1979, $1 billion 415 million in fiscal year 1980, and $1 billion 569 million in fiscal year 1981.

A 50-percent credit simply provides more aid than a lower credit. For example, many of our secondary and elementary schools have tuition rates that are very low, as low as $100 or $200. Without this amendment, a $100 payment of tuition would entitle the taxpayer paying the tuition to a $25 credit. The purpose of this amendment is to make it a $50 tax credit if the tuition is $100.

The purpose of this is to reach the large segment of people who are involved at the lower and secondary school levels.

Moreover, Mr. Chairman, a $50 credit with a dollar ceiling tends to direct more of the benefits to students attending the lower cost schools, those institutions where the tuition is lower. Such schools usually have a higher proportion of families from low income groups and minority groups involved. At the post-secondary level these schools are frequently public institutions. Thus a higher rate of credit provides a greater benefit to those who really need it at the elementary and secondary school levels.

Mr. Chairman, my colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL), is a cosponsor of this legislation. We feel that this is a necessary part of a tuition credit bill, and I hope that my colleagues will consider this amendment favorably.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VANIK. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I concur in the gentleman's description of the amendment, and I agree with his zeal for its passage. He is correct in saying that this amendment will help more at the elementary and secondary school level where tuition is low, and it will help in the community colleges and land-grant colleages where the tuition is proportionately lower.

It is, to an extent, a regional amendment, because those areas like the Northeast, where a high proportion of students are in nonpublic colleges, will tend to do better, proportionately, under the 25 percent than under the 50 percent. But as you go west, to California, where 90 percent of the students are in public colleges, there they need the extra 50 percent to come up to the maximum $250 tuition tax credits.

So I think the gentleman for his leadership on this amendment. I hope that it will be accepted.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment now under consideration will restore another section of the Vanik bill to increase the percent of tuition eligible for the credit to 50 percent from 25 percent as in the bill's present form.

A 50-percent credit will be more beneficial to those students and parents who choose less expensive forms of education. At the postsecondary level, approximately 8.7 million students attend less expensive public colleges, as compared to 2.4 million students attending more expensive private colleges. The additional cost of this amendment is miniscule by comparison to the number of additional students who would be eligible for the full amount of the tax credit. The Joint Committee estimates the additional cost of a 50-percent credit will add $6 million in fiscal year 1978, $124 million for fiscal year 1979, $174 million for fiscal year 1980 and $279 million for fiscal year 1981. Thus, the total cost of the post-secondary level education with the 50-percent credit will be $22 million in fiscal year 1978, $541 million in fiscal year 1979, $954 million in fiscal year 1980, and $1,175 million in fiscal year 1981.

At the elementary and secondary level, where tuition averages $470 annually, a 50-percent credit would be far more advantageous to those taxpayers. The additional cost of the 50-percent amendment will add an additional $3 million in fiscal year 1978, $77 million in fiscal year 1979, $107 million in fiscal year 1980, and $177 million in fiscal year 1981. Thus, the total cost of extending the credit to elementary and secondary level students, at the 50-percent credit will be $12 million in fiscal year 1978, $295 million in fiscal year 1977, $461 million in fiscal year 1980, and $487 million in fiscal year 1981.

In most States outside the Northeast, from 85 percent to 95 percent of all college level students would receive lower benefits, somewhere under $150 with a $250 maximum, while most of the approximately 2.5 million students attending private higher educational institutions, receive the full $250 credit. For example, public college students are 89 percent of the total in Oregon and Washington, 85 percent in Texas, 90 percent in California, 86 percent in Louisiana, 88 percent in Virginia, 88 percent in Michigan, and 87 percent in Wisconsin. In these and most other States, the 25-percent rule would mean lower benefits for students attending less expensive public colleges.

Private college students are heavily concentrated in a few States. Over 25 percent of all private college students in the country attend college in Massachusetts and New York. Over half attend college in only six States—the above two plus Pennsylvania, California, Illinois, and Ohio. Thus, the 25-percent feature is a device by which taxpayers in all 50 percent contribute disproportionately to students attending college in six States, while most students in their own States are discriminated against.

In States such as Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania, hundreds of thousands of public college students come from families faced with a severe financial squeeze. These families need tax relief as much as the families of private college students.

Therefore, I urge my colleagues to support the amendment restoring the credit to 50 percent, which will benefit students attending State, community, and junior colleges. The amendment has the full support of the American Association of Community and Junior Colleges which represents 4 million students and 1,000 institutions.

[2] Those with higher private than public students.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I strongly oppose this amendment. The Ways and Means Committee accepted my suggestion that we set the credit at 25 percent of tuition costs. The Vanik amendment would reverse this decision and put the credit at 50 percent of tuition costs.

The arguments in favor of a 25-percent credit far outweigh those for a 50-percent credit. The major difference between the two is their sensitivity to the burden of tuition on families with comparable incomes. There is a substantial tuition gap between private colleges and universities which are forced to charge high tuitions in order to survive and lower-cost state subsidized public schools. Next school year, private school tuitions will average about $2,649 with quite a few exceeding $4,000 and even $5,000. Public universities, in comparison, will average $651 at four-year schools and $408 at two-year schools.

To illustrate how the tax credit affects the tuition gap, consider two families with the same income. One is sending a child to a college charging $1,000 in tuition. The other family's child goes to a college charging $500. In 1980, the family paying $1,000 or more in tuition would get the full $250 credit while the family paying only $500 in tuition would receive a $125 credit. Under the 50-percent credit proposed by my colleague, however, both families would receive the same credit, even though one family had twice the tuition burden of the other.

I think it is appropriate for a larger tax credit to go to families bearing heavier tuition burdens. It is also good policy for our tax credit legislation to establish at the outset the principle of a tuition-sensitive credit, one that recognizes the gap between high and low-cost institutions and works to reduce that gap not widen it.

It is important not to confuse families paying high tuitions and families with high incomes. Many times they are not the same people. Children from every economic strata attend costly schools and inexpensive schools. It is not unusual, for example, for one child in a family to go to an expensive four-year school while another child in the same family attends the local community college. This helps explain why the distribution of benefits under the 25 percent credit and the 50 percent credit are just about the same. The major difference is that the 25 percent credit provides relatively more assistance to the family with the greater need. This would be particularly true if in the future we ever decided to continue and increase the total amount of tuition tax credits.

I have heard it said that tuition credits will simply be passed straight through to schools in the guise of increased tuition charges. The 25-percent credit makes this quite unlikely. Most schools are already trying to hold their tuition increases to the bare minimum needed to survive and provide an adequate educational program because they realize that every increase puts their school beyond the reach of some families. With a 25-percent credit, families will still have to pay 75 cents of every dollar of increased tuition. Schools will continue to have a strong incentive to hold their cost increases down.

ELEMENTARY/SECONDARY

The constitutionality of this legislation will be tested before the Supreme Court. A major consideration will be whether the credit is really aid to institutions rather than aid to parents. A 25-percent credit is far more convincing as a program of relief to parents than is a 50-percent credit. A somewhat parallel situation exists with the 20-percent tax credit for work related day care expenses. No one has ever argued, to my knowledge, that the day care credit is a program of Federal aid to day care centers. It is universally acknowledged as a means of alleviating some of the extra burden borne by workers who have young children. Moving from a 20-percent credit covering the expenses of a 4-year-old attending a day care center to a 25-percent credit covering the expenses of a 5-year-old attending kindergarten is a relatively small step. I believe, therefore, the 25-percent credit is more likely than the 50-percent credit to pass the test of constitutionality.

ELEMENTARY/SECONDARY

Many supporters of the public schools oppose the tax credit because they fear two things:

First, that the credit will motivate many parents to turn to private schools and desert their local public schools in terms of both attendance and ultimately tax support; and

Second, that the tax credit will encourage and support racially segregated schools set up in response to integrated public systems. I do not really think either of these things will happen to any measurable extent, but at the 25-percent tax credit level the likelihood is even more remote than at the 50-percent level.

ELEMENTARY/SECONDARY

At a 25-percent credit, parents will still pay 75 cents of every dollar of tuition. In order to volunteer for this substantial financial burden they are going to have to want very much the alternative offered by the private school—be it a special program, a religious element, or a different peer group. In short, with the 25-percent credit parents will take their children out of the public schools for the same reasons they do today, not for economic incentive provided by the credit. The credit will merely assist them after they have made that decision.

Finally, the issue of cost is involved. According to the latest cost estimates provided by the Congressional Budget Office and the Joint Committee on Taxation, for higher education the costs of switching from a 25- to a 50-percent credit would be in the $140 million range in fiscal year 1979, approximately $170 million in fiscal year 1980, and nearly $300 million in fiscal year 1981. Increasing the credit to 50 percent and including elementary and secondary education would bring the total cost of the bill to about $835 million next year and approximately $1.5 billion by fiscal year 1981.

Mr. Chairman, I am tempted to suggest that for all these reasons, the 25-percent credit is a more rational approach to the tuition tax credit. But I will refrain, because I have seen that rationality is often not sufficient motivation in this body.

Let me just say instead that the 25-percent credit will work better than the 50-percent credit, will cost somewhat less and will lay a better groundwork for the future of this program.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this House just voted on the first Vanik amendment. On a very close vote, it passed.

I think I would stand by my original statements that that first Vanik amendment was a bad one. This one merely would compound a felony. This amendment would more than double the drain on the revenues that should be flowing into our Government. This one will exacerbate more the kind of tensions I talked about earlier.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment does nothing more than to make what I think was a bad amendment an even worse step.

I will not take further time. I would just urge that this amendment be voted down immediately and soundly. It is a bad amendment. It does not really do any good for anyone, and it is injurious to the kind of budget projections which we are seeking to make in terms of the revenues flowing into this Government.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the defeat of the Vanik amendment.

Mr. SISK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to join in a colloquy with my good friend, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. MITCHELL).

I find myself totally on the gentleman's side, but I am tempted to vote for this amendment.

I am going to be completely open and aboveboard. I think we have just done one of the worst things, certainly in my lifetime, which this Congress has ever done when we, by a very narrow margin, approved a bad amendment. Of course, I agree totally with my colleague from Maryland that this just compounds what is a very sad situation.

However, I am curious about something. Since we are talking quite frankly here, does not the gentleman feel there is a better chance that this bill is going to be vetoed, that this turkey is going to die if, in fact, it is adopted, or that we may even become disgusted and decide to vote it down?

Will the gentleman comment on that?

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I will be glad to comment.

I think every one of these bad amendments enhances the chance of a Presidential veto; and I think that this House would sustain the veto based on that last vote.

Mr. SISK. There is no question about that.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. On the other hand, on every piece of legislation on which we vote, we vote in terms of principle; and I, for one, cannot ignore the principle involved here in terms of the political considerations further down the line. Therefore, I am coming from a position of principle in asking for the defeat of the Vanik amendment.

The gentleman is quite right. If we have many more of these kinds of amendments, they will guarantee a Presidential veto of this bill.

Mr. SISK. Mr. Chairman, let me say that I have great respect for my colleague from Maryland. I, too, like to operate from principle; and I probably will vote against this amendment because, as the gentleman says, it is a bad, bad amendment. It is even worse than the other one.

What is particularly unique is that it is a dead giveaway as to the very kinds of arguments we have been hearing all afternoon about getting the nose under the tent. They did not even wait to get this bill through the House before they came in here to double the benefits.

Mr. Chairman, I have great respect for and I am fond of my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK). He has had a lot of fun with this legislation. However, this is very serious business; and I feel very strongly about this matter.

Again, I think it is the most tragic thing that I have seen happen in my 24 years here; and I feel this very sincerely. Yet, I respect a person's right to vote his convictions. I just feel that the results of it are going to be tragic. Very frankly, in discussing this matter with my friend from Maryland, I feel so strongly that I am almost willing to do anything to make absolutely certain that this bill can never become law.

If it does, thank God for the Supreme Court across the street over here, because they have saved us from ourselves before, and hopefully they may do it again.

So, whatever vote a Member may cast, I would just hope that this whole package is defeated once this amendment is adopted or rejected, because certainly now this is even a worse package than it was when it came out of the Committee on Ways and Means.

I would plead with my colleagues to vote to kill the whole package, and let us get back to some serious things which this country desperately needs if we are in fact to live up to our responsibilities.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FRENZEL) there were—ayes 37, noes 57.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. CARNEY. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 142, noes 261, not voting 31, as follows:

AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. MIKVA

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which is in order under the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. MIKVA:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Tuition Tax Deferral Act of 1978".

SEC. 2. DEFERRAL OF INCOME TAX FOR CERTAIN TUITION.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subchapter B of chapter 62 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to extensions of time for payment of tax) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 6168. EXTENSION OF TIME FOR PAYMENT OF TAX WHERE TAXPAYER HAS PAID CERTAIN TUITION.

"(a) EXTENSION PERMITTED.—In the case of an individual who pays tuition for the calendar year in which the taxable year begins to one or more eligible educational institutions for himself, his spouse, or any of his dependents, such individual may elect to pay in installments part or all of so much of the tax imposed by chapter 1 for such taxable year as does not exceed such tuition.

"(b) DOLLAR LIMITATIONS—

"(1) PER YEAR.—The maximum dollar amount of tuition which is paid for any calendar year for any individual and which may be taken into account under subsection (a) shall not exceed the applicable amount determined under the following table:

"In the case of a calendar year:	The applicable amount is:

The first such installment shall be paid on or before the 15th day of the 4th month of the first taxable year following the first taxable year (after the taxable year for which the taxpayer makes the election) during which the individual is not a full-time student. Any succeeding installment shall be paid on or before the date which is one year after the date prescribed by this paragraph for payment of the preceding installment.

"(2) INTEREST AT RATE OF 3 PERCENT.—Interest on any tax payable in installments under this section (including any deficiency prorated to installments payable under this section) shall be paid at a rate of 3 percent (in lieu of the rate specified by section 6601 (a)) for any period before the date such tax is required to be paid under this section. For purposes of section 6601(b)(1), any election to pay tax in installments under this section shall be treated as an extension of time for payment of such tax.

"(3) DETERMINATION OF UNDERPAYMENTS AND OVERPAYMENTS.—In determining the amount of any underpayment or overpayment for the taxable year, any amount payable in installments in subsequent taxable years by reason of this section shall not be treated as tax due for the taxable year.

"(B) NONTAXABLE SCHOLARSHIP OR EDUCATIONAL ASSISTANCE ALLOWANCE DEFINED.—For purposes of subparagraph (A), the term 'nontaxable scholarship or educational assistance allowance' means—

"(i) a scholarship or fellowship grant (within the meaning of section 117(a)(1)) or similar award which is not includible in gross income, and

"(j) REGULATIONS.—The Secretary shall prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section."

(b) SUSPENSION OF RUNNING OF PERIOD OF LIMITATIONS.—Section 6503 of such Code (relating to suspension of running of period of limitations) is amended by redesignating subsection (i) as subsection (j) and by inserting after subsection (h) the following new subsection:

"(i) EXTENSION OF TIME FOR PAYMENT OF TAX WHERE TAXPAYER HAS PAID CERTAIN TUITION.—The running of the period of limitations for the collection of any tax payable in installments under section 6168 shall be suspended for the period during which there are any unpaid installments of such tax."

(c) DISREGARD OF EXTENSION OF TIME FOR PAYMENT OF TAX.—Any election by an individual to pay tax in installments under section 6168 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 shall not be taken into account for purposes of determining the eligibility of such individual or any other individual for benefits or assistance, or the amount of extent of benefits or assistance, under any Federal program of educational assistance or under any State or local program of educational assistance financed in whole or in part with Federal funds.

(d) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of sections for subchapter B of chapter 62 of such Code is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"Sec. 6168. Extension of time for payment of tax where taxpayer has paid certain tuition."

(e) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to taxable years ending on or after August 1, 1978.

SEC. 3. STUDY

The Secretary of the Treasury or his delegate and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare or his delegate shall each conduct a study of the operation and effects of section 6168 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (as added by this Act), and prepare and transmit to the Congress, during the first quarter of calendar 1980 and during the first quarter of calendar 1982, a report containing the results of such study with respect to the period elapsing before such quarter during which such section 6168 was in effect. Each report transmitted to the Congress under the preceding sentence shall be published in the Federal Register.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide a deferral of income taxes where the taxpayer pays certain tuition."

Mr. MIKVA (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment in the nature of a substitute be considered as read and printed in the RECORD. Copies of it are available.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There is no objection.

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment in the nature of a substitute that was made in order by the Committee on Rules pursuant to the request of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. Chairman, let me emphasize it is a substitute amendment and it will replace the entire bill that came out of the committee, including the Vanik amendment that was adopted.

The vote in the Committee on Ways and Means on this amendment was 19 to 18, and all the Members have received copies of letters circulated by the 18 Members who supported this proposal in the committee. The Members recently received a letter signed by my friend, the cosponsor of this amendment, the gentleman from California (Mr. KETCHUM), by other Members, and by me.

This amendment has been supported by various college groups and by various educational groups. It is even supported by the college students themselves.

The frustrating part about the actions we have taken heretofore and the action that we will take after we complete final action on the bill as it now rests is that we have argued vast constitutional principles. We have talked about the First Amendment and the separation of church and state; we have talked about the future of public school education and the pluralism of the educational product. We have done everything but provide any meaningful assistance to the targets of our help.

The bill as it now stands will provide $50 or $100 or later on up to the grand total of $250 of help to higher education students, and in other education it will provide less help to parents of elementary and secondary school students.

The fact of the matter is that those arguments on principle that we have just engaged in and those constitutional arguments that we have just engaged in may elucidate the state of the Constitution, and they may make good reading back home, but they surely are not going to do very much to educate our children. They surely are not going to provide very much help to a strapped parent who is trying to find ways of keeping one or more of his children in higher education at a time.

The substitute which the gentleman from California (Mr. KETCHUM) and I propose to this House solves those problems. Starting this year, it provides $1,000 worth of tax deferral, $1,000 worth of tax relief for the parents of every child in an institution of higher education, whether it is an undergraduate or graduate school. That goes up to $1,500 and then up to $2,000.

The revenue impact, the impact on the budget—and by that I mean the fiscal impact—of that proposal is far less than the impact from the actions that we have taken already.

Why is that? Because instead of being a forgiveness, this is a loan; this is a deferral. The people who take the deferral will pay the money back over a 10-year period, with interest, so that by 1987 or 1988 the Treasury will, in fact, be showing a surplus as a result of this proposal rather than a substantial bite into the revenue which either the bill as it came out of committee or the bill as modified by the Vanik proposal will cost.

This amendment focuses attention on the real problem that parents of college students have, and that is that for a temporary period of time they have a serious cash shortage. There just are not enough aftertax dollars for most Americans, rich, poor, or indifferent, to pay for one or more college educations at a time out of their regular earnings.

What this bill proposes is that during that 4-year period, that 6-year period, or that 8-year period, however long the child or student is in school, there will be meaningful tax relief: Up to $2,000 per student to be repaid over a 10-year period at a modest interest rate.

I am aware that the action we are urging the Members to take at this point is inconsistent with the action on the Vanik amendment, but we honestly think that this is a better way of solving all the problems. The parliamentary situation is that this amendment is a substitute and will apply only to higher education. If it works as we think it will, if it is as good as we think it is, perhaps in the future it can be extended to include elementary and secondary schools.

Many of the constitutional problems we worry about would be minimized under this kind of a loan program, as opposed to a grant program. In any event, I really think we ought to try to walk before we run; we ought to try to crawl before we leap forward.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. MIKVA was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, I honestly believe that the middle-income taxpayer needs some help. I honestly believe that the time has come to give some help to the middle-income people. I see us giving them no help when we provide for them a bill with so little money in it, a bill that does not go anywhere toward solving the problem, and a bill that provides such a constitutional problem that the Attorney General has already advised the President of the United States it is unconstitutional and thus he has to veto it.

Mr. Chairman, I think this kind of a substitute will really provide some help where it is most needed. It will give us a real bill with real money and real assistance to people who need it.

Mr. DANIELSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MIKVA. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DANIELSON. Mr. Chairman, let me ask the gentleman these questions:

Who are the creditors under the loans? Are the loans dischargeable in bankruptcy? And does the gentleman's amendment serve as a substitute for the entire bill?

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, let me answer the gentleman's questions in reverse order.

First, my amendment is a substitute for the entire bill.

The loans are not dischargeable in bankruptcy because they are tax liens or they are tax amounts due.

The creditor is the taxpayer, the parent of the student who takes the deferral in the first place. The relationship is between the taxpayer and the Internal Revenue Service all the way through.

Mr. DANIELSON. Could it be both the student and the parent?

Mr. MIKVA. If the student is in the tax bracket where the deferral does amount to some good, he can take it.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MIKVA. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Mikva-Ketchum substitute amendment which would establish a tution tax deferral program for higher education.

The tuition tax credit legislation we have before us today is simply bad policy. It is a costly program—the bill reported by the committee would cost some $0.9 billion. If the proposed elementary and secondary credit is included the cost soars to $1.6 billion. Yet despite these tremendous costs, there is no reason to believe that the legislation would provide any meaningful tax relief to the families it purports to help.

Neither the committee tax credit for higher education nor the proposed elementary and secondary credit have any needs criterion. The Department of the Treasury and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare have estimated that some 50 to 60 percent of the benefits of H.R. 12050 would go to families earning more than $20,000 a year, with an estimated 20 to 30 percent going to families earning more than $30,000 a year.

In other words, we are asking the taxpayers of this country to foot the bill for the education of many students whose families can well afford to send them to school. Yet the aid that families from middle and lower incomes would receive is not enough to pay their education expenses. In short, the bill provides only token relief to those who need it most, yet also provides unnecessary benefits to those who have no financial need.

Like most of my colleagues, I have received many letters from my constiuents urging me to support tuition tax credits for private elementary and secondary education. I can sympathize with the situation of many of these families who must make financial sacrifices because of their decision to send their childern to private schools. However, here again, I must question the wisdom of the type of relief being proposed for these families. The amount of the credit is so small—only $50 in 1978, $100 in 1979, and $100 in 1980—that I do not see how it could possibly provide any helpful tax relief to families who find themselves financially hardpressed.

So, the proposal strikes me as being a most ineffective one. Even more disturbing, however, are the constitutional implications of this plan. The Attorney General in an opinion to Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare Califano indicated that any tax credit plan for elementary and secondary school students would be held to be unconstitutional.

The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights agrees that the proposal is unconstitutional and is especially concerned that a tax credit plan for elementary and secondary education would put the Federal Government in the position of subsidizing segregated private schools which have been established to circumvent the desegregation of public schools. The distinguished Representative from New York, SHIRLEY CHISHOLM, in a recent "Dear Colleague" letter shared a letter from the Commission on Civil Rights in which Chairman Arthur Flemming states:

> Enactment of legislation authorizing tax credits for tuition paid to private elementary and secondary schools which are recognized as tax-exempt organizations under the Internal Revenue Code would effectively increase federal support of school segregation in direct violation of the Constitution.

While there are certainly many fine private institutions which are not segregated and which provide equal educational opportunity, it is unfortunately also true that many private segregated schools were established as a response to public school desegregation. I believe that acceptance of tax credits for elementary and secondary education could seriously undermine civil rights enforcement efforts in education.

For these reasons I do not believe it would be responsible or equitable for the Congress to adopt legislation to provide tax credits at the elementary and secondary level. We should ease the financial burdens of middle-income taxpayers, but this legislation is not the way to do it. The appropriate response of the Congress to the distress of these middle-income families should be the swift enactment of meaningful tax reform legislation. The administration has also pledged to explore ways to assure that students in nonpublic elementary and secondary schools receive a constitutionally appropriate share of federal benefits, and I support the Administration in that effort.

We can also take steps to provide some financial relief to families whose children are in institutions of higher education. One proposal which I support is the middle-income students assistance bill which was reported by the Committee on Education and Labor. This legislation would substantially improve and expand the grant, loan and work study programs operated by the Office of Education. I hope we will have an opportunity to debate this legislation in the near future and that the Congress will approve it.

In addition to this proposal, the Mikva-Ketchum substitute now under consideration would be of significant help to the parents of college students. Under the substitute, taxpayers would be permitted to defer up to $1,000 in taxes per year per student. The amount would increase to $2,000 in 1986. The amounts deferred would be repaid over 10 years following the student's graduation at a 3 percent interest rate.

The advantages of this substitute are many. First and foremost, it offers real tax relief to parents of college students, not merely a token amount. It provides the tax relief—some 10 times more relief than the tax credit proposal—at the time when a family's budget is strained because of the expenses of higher education.

The deferral proposal also puts significantly less strain on our budget. The Mikva-Ketchum substitute would result in a revenue loss of only $.199 billion in fiscal year 1978, with the amount increasing to $1.619 billion in 1983. From that point, the amount of the revenue loss would actually begin to decline as repayments begin to be made. Thus, by the early 1990's there will be no revenue loss at all.

I am convinced of the merits of this proposal. I believe that it is clearly a more effective approach to the needs of middle income families than the tuition tax credit plan. I urge my colleagues to join me in voting for the substitute offered by Mr. MIKVA and Mr. KETCHUM.

Mr. MARRIOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MIKVA. I yield to the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. MARRIOTT. What effect would this have on the Treasury the first year before these loans are repaid?

Mr. MIKVA. The highest cost in any given time, the highest out-of-pocket Treasury amount, is in fiscal year 1983, when no moneys are coming in, and it is going up to the maximum amount, and it will be $1.6 billion.

But next year, fiscal year 1978, it is $199 million. Then by 1989, it starts to bring money back in. All of these are deferred accounts or suspense items.

Mr. MARRIOTT. So it never exceeds $1.9 billion?

Mr. MIKVA. It never exceeds $1.6 billion.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MIKVA. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. VOLKMER. Under the gentleman's proposal, if I defer 4 years, would I have 10 years before I have to make a payment back?

Mr. MIKVA. No, sir. You would start repaying at the end of the fourth year one-tenth of the amount you deferred in any given year and a 10-year period for each deferral.

Mr. VOLKMER. For my first year I would have to repay $100?

Mr. MIKVA. Yes.

Mr. VOLKMER. The second year, third year, and fourth year, I would have to recompute that each additional year?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA) has expired.

(On request of Mr. VOLKMER and by unanimous consent, Mr. MIKVA was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. VOLKMER. If the gentleman will yield further, I as a taxpayer would have to recompute that on the second, third, and fourth year payback; is that correct?

Mr. MIKVA. That is correct. The maximum amount you would have to repay in any given year would be $400 for the $4,000 loan.

I might say there are other deferral items in the Tax Code. The Treasury, while they do not welcome this burden, can handle it.

Mr. VOLKMER. They are going to audit my return every year?

Mr. MIKVA. No. They will not audit your return any more than now.

Mr. VOLKMER. How are they going to know if I paid it back or not?

Mr. MIKVA. The same way that they handle your tax returns now.

Mr. VOLKMER. That is all?

Mr. MIKVA. That is all.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MIKVA. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. THOMPSON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, having read the gentleman's letter, I suppose I should apologize for not understanding something, but assuming I should defer for a period of 4 years, and in the interim, notwithstanding I owe, hypothetically, a thousand dollars for each of those years, my personal income has increased by 30 percent, will I pay back at my new tax rate or my deferred rate?

Mr. MIKVA. It will not go up or down.

Mr. DANIELSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the effort the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA) has made. His amendment indicates a return to the realm of sanity, and I am going to support the amendment. I urge my colleagues to do the same. At least, as he said, it would provide some meaningful tax relief to those who wish to send members of their family to college but not at the same time take money out of the pockets of the taxpayers in your district and mine to send other people's kids to college.

I mentioned in my little talk on the first Vanik amendment that I have not heard a candidate for public office in the last several years, and particularly this year, say that they are going to go out and support a new spending program, a new tax giveaway.

I have heard it more from the other side of the Chamber than I have from my own side, but I hear it from both sides. We promise our constituents, "You send me back to Congress and I can promise you I will try to hold down on unnecessary expenditures, and I emphatically will not vote for any new tax program, any new expenditure." That, however, is exactly what we will do under the Vanik proposal.

Mr. Chairman, I respectfully submit that we are going to run into the crisis which Benjamin Franklin recognized. When Dr. Franklin walked out of the Constitutional Convention, some lady stopped him and said, "Dr. Franklin, what kind of government have you given us?"

He said, "A Republic, Madam, if we can keep it."

Mr. Chairman, that is what we have had for 200 years; but one of the reasons we have had it is that we have erected an absolute barrier between church and state. We have kept the secular from the lay activities completely. We have likewise protected our taxpayers by not taxing one person to send another person's child to private schools or to private colleges. We have one public school system, we cannot afford two school systems supported by taxes.

Mr. Chairman, I have not heard from one schoolteacher organization, from one board of education, from one department of education, from one PTA which favors the Vanik proposal. I have heard from many which oppose the Vanik proposal.

I come from California. In case the Members do not know it, we have a proposal on the ballot next Tuesday which is the epitome of the taxpayers' revolt. It is going to cut the property tax base more than in half. Why? Because people are fed up to the gills with more taxing and taxing and spending and spending. That is what those Members who voted "aye" on the Vanik proposals are voting for. They are the big spenders. Let us not forget it. When I get home, I am going to tell people who are the big spenders.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DANIELSON. Not at this moment. I have something on my chest which I want to get off.

Mr. Chairman, 13 short years ago, in 1965, the Members will recall that it was considered a sin to have Federal aid of any kind to education; but the camel's nose got under the flap of the tent—just 13 or 14 years ago. Man, has that camel grown.

According to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the Office of Management and Budget, and the Congressional Budget Office, in 1978 we are spending $13 billion—that is "b" as in "Boston"—$13,612,000,000 in direct Federal expenditures for elementary and secondary and higher education, and another $4,853,000,000 on indirect aid of that type, making an aggregate of $18,465,000,000. Some camel. Some nose. That is all I can say.

Mr. Chairman, American taxpayers can only afford to support one—I repeat, one—system of education. We have one system of education.

The exact figures of our Federal aid to education are as follows:

FEDERAL EDUCATION FUNDING BY CONTROL OF INSTITUTION, FISCAL YEAR 1978

[Budget Authority in millions]

	Public	Private	Total
Direct Federal Expenditures:
Elementary and secondary education	$5,691	$320	$6,011

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DANIELSON. I am now delighted to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, I know the gentleman from California (Mr. DANIELSON) is a historian of note, and I know the gentleman is keenly aware that there was no public school system in America worthy of the name until about 1848, and that this country was founded on private education and private schools, and I also know that the gentleman's understanding of the Constitution is acute. Therefore, the gentleman knows that there is nothing un-American about private or parochial education. Georgetown was founded in 1789, and that is a pretty American institution.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. DANIELSON) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. DANIELSON was allowed to proceed for 4 additional minutes.)

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield so that I may finish my statement.

Mr. DANIELSON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, I am always somewhat taken aback by people who talk about taxing and taxing and spending and spending and yet support budget resolutions that call for an 11 percent increase in spending.

However, let me just point out that this is not a tax expenditure. This is leaving some of the hard-earned money in the pocket of the taxpayer.

Mr. DANIELSON. Mr. Chairman, I must recapture my time.

Mr. HYDE. I thought the gentleman would.

Mr. DANIELSON. Mr. Chairman, I am delighted at the gentleman's smiles. I know now why he is called "Happy HENRY HYDE."

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DANIELSON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, let us talk about the big spenders. The Mikva amendment in fiscal year 1978 will lose $199 million. The Vanik amendment, as we have adopted it, will cost $25 million.

In fiscal year 1979, the Mikva amendment will lose $1,338 million, but the Vanik amendment and the bill up to the present time would lose $635 million.

In fiscal year 1980 the Mikva amendment will cost $1,324 million; the Vanik amendment, $1,134 million.

This is the last fiscal year, 1981: The Mikva amendment will cost $1,260 million; the Vanik amendment, $1,206 million.

Over 4 years, there is approximately a $1 billion difference between the Vanik amendment and the Mikva amendment.

Mr. DANIELSON. I now recapture my time.

Mr. VANIK. The gentleman had better. These are facts; these are figures.

Mr. DANIELSON. I would like to respond to the gentleman. To continue seriatim those years, in the following years, a couple of years after that, the Treasury will recapture by repayment of loans, with interest, the amount of money that the Mikva amendment would spend. So, whereas the Vanik amendment simply drains the money out of the Treasury, the Mikva amendment puts it out to earn money at interest and recapture it for the American taxpayers—the Treasury.

That is what we ought to do. That is the businesslike way of running a system. Let us get back on the track and do business in a businesslike way.

I wish someone would raise this constitutional argument again, because here is the answer: Why is it not unconstitutional to give to a church directly, but somehow unconstitutional if we have a tax credit? Very obviously, ladies and gentlemen, when we give to any nonprofit organization, any 501(c)(3) corporation, we are entitled to have a deduction from our taxable income for that amount. But, we cannot take tax money which, in effect, is in the Treasury and say, "Here, take this tax money, this is to be used for the specific purpose, one specific purpose only, to spend it for this purpose, the education of my son Charlie."

No, sir, when we have a tax deduction for charitable contributions, the contribution goes into the general fund of the charitable organization for general purposes. It is deducted from our gross income before taxes are computed. If we give a contribution to a church or school or what have you, it is deducted from gross income in order to determine taxable income and we pay income tax on the remainder, on the taxable income. If we make a contribution to a church or school we do not have a tax credit of 100 percent; we have a tax deduction of 40 percent, or whatever our tax bracket may be, and the church or school has a contribution, not tax money, and can use it for whatever purpose it wishes and need not use it to educate son Charlie. The Vanik amendment and this bill permits the taxpayer to earmark tax funds for a special purpose. That is quite a big difference, ladies and gentlemen; enough of a difference to separate unconstitutionality from constitutionality.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DANIELSON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio continues to play with the idea that his amendment is such a small amount of money that the principle is not important, since it is a smaller amount of money than anybody else's idea. Therefore, it is a superior idea.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. FORD of Michigan and by unanimous consent Mr. DANIELSON was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. FORD of Michigan. What the gentleman continually refuses to see is what everybody in this Chamber that has followed this whole question of tax credits in this Congress knows to be the fact, that this illegitimate proposal that was just adopted by the House a little while ago, made more illegitimate by the Vanik amendment, is on its way to a shotgun wedding with the Moynihan-Packwood package that is coming like a freight train to the House from the Senate.

The real vote in this House is going to come very soon when that conference committee comes back and asks us to vote for a package that the Vanik amendment has now made in order in this House. That is not going to cost $25 million, as he suggested, in the first year for very long, but in 5 years it is going to be $5.2 billion off the top, before the Congress can act on one single piece of legislation to decide what our priorities in education ought to be. We must decide whether the bulk of the education money spent in this country is going to be spent through the IRS or through the educators.

Mr. DANIELSON. Woe on those of you who vote for this bill and go home and tell the people that you are for economy—Heaven forbid. I say, let us support the Mikva amendment. It makes some sense. It is not dischargeable in bankruptcy. It will generate some interest and be a meaningful method of putting our kids through college. I say vote "aye" on the Mikva amendment.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the Mikva amendment is not an add-on amendment; it is a total substitute. It destroys all the tuition tax credit provisions we have been talking about so far. It offers instead an IRS deferred loan payment system. Although far more complex, it is another loan program similar to the ones we have already in operation, only this time the Treasury Department is going to act as the banker, advancing and collecting the tax dollar over a 10-year period in extra tax payments.

The existing guaranteed student loan program has a lot of advantages over the Mikva program. One can get $2,500 a year under the guaranteed student loan program, but only $1,000 under the Mikva proposal. Obviously there is a good deal of advantage to the existing program.

The problem with the Mikva proposal, although it is an ingenious one and I congratulate its inventor for providing some good thoughts on a very difficult situation, is that it provides terrible red-tape and administrative cost.

The Treasury says frankly it does not know how to operate the Mikva amendment. It would require the taxpayers to keep their papers for 10 years after a child completes school, which probably means they have to keep their papers for 14 years. And, if they have more than one kid, they are going to have to be keeping records for IRS almost forever.

In addition, the IRS does not know how to keep track of all those dependents. The Treasury tells me they will have to set up new data banks to identify the children and feed information into the computers and including probably the social security numbers. Currently we have only to list our children by name. I do not know if that privacy problem worries the Members or not.

In addition, we will have an overlapping with three Government student loan programs. As Members recall, we have defaults of about $500 million and more than that in the Government loan program already. That is a better program as it stands, but with the troubles we have in that we can anticipate the kinds of problems we are going to have in the Mikva bill.

It is important to note also that when we get one of these loans we are going to lose the exemption we have on our dependents. If the Ways and Means Committee and the Finance Committee of the Congress act in the way I think they might this year, we may be giving up more in a personal exemption than we will be gaining in a loan, so there may be no benefit at all to the taxpayer.

If one dies, what happens? The IRS cannot collect on the loan. Maybe there is some kind of probate, but the IRS is not notified if the estate is not more than $200,000. If there is not any money left over, the IRS will whistle for its money.

The idea that this is not going to cost us is erroneous, and we will wind up having it cost more in the long run. It will cost us in the case of defaults or deaths and in all kinds of ways.

I believe that this substitute amendment is not the way to fight fraud and abuse. There will be more recordkeeping. It will cost a great deal of money.

But most of all, it is not what our constituents are talking about. They want tuition tax credits. They do not want a fancy new loan program that they and their tax consultants do not understand. If the Members do not like tuition tax credits for college or for elementary and secondary education, then vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois. But, if Members believe in tuition tax credits, if that is what our constituents want, then we had better vote down this amendment.

It is important to note the tax deferral bill was not passed by the Ways and Means Committee, nor did the bill have the advantage of hearings specifically for the deferral concept. In fact, during the 5½ days of hearings held by the committee only 2 witnesses out of a total of around 120, even mentioned the deferral concept—one being Mr. MIKVA.

Even the present guaranteed student loan program has many advantages over the substitute bill. Under existing law, freshman students and all other undergraduate students may receive loans of up to $2,500 per year as compared with the $1,000 sophomore, junior, and senior students can receive under the Mikva approach. The Mikva bill does not even allow freshman students to be eligible for any amount in any year. The first year of college is often the most financially difficult year for a great many American families.

Further disadvantages exist. For instance, if a taxpayer had a student entering the second year of college this fall, the maximum amount the parents could defer for 3 years would be $3,000. By comparison, the same student under the guaranteed student loan program, would be eligible for a total of $7,500 in loans. If students were only in school half-time (accounting for 2.6 million students or 23 percent of the entire postsecondary student population in 1977-78 school year) these students would receive no advantage at all under the deferral bill. The GSL program allows all half-time students to be eligible for benefits. Beginning school this fall, a graduate student could receive loans under the GSL program totaling $5,000 per year. Graduate students are not eligible to receive benefits under the deferral concept. If Congress were to pass the middle-income student assistance bill, which seems likely, there would be no income limitations to students under the guaranteed student loan program. Thus, it seems to me that what we are discussing here is a bill that has far fewer advantages than those under our existing GSL program.

The Department of the Treasury has not exactly been enthusiastic about the possibility of a tax deferral bill. Here are some of the problems they shared with me. First of all, the prospect of being in the loan business does not exactly excite them. Second, the recordkeeping for the taxpayer and for IRS would be incredible. For example, a taxpayer with only one child would have to keep records for 13 years, compared to the 3 to 6 years under current tax law. While the tax code currently provides for corporation deferrals, in a limited fashion, these are corporations that normally keep records over a long period of time.

So far, this approach does not seem so complicated, but what about the taxpayer who has more than one child. Let us say that "Junior" begins his second year of college in 1978. Mom and dad complete their tax return for calendar year 1978 and are slated to receive a small refund prior to taking a deferral. Assuming that their tax liability is greater than the amount they are going to defer, Treasury would have to increase that refund. Under the deferral provisions, 4 years later they begin to repay the loan. However, little "Susie" is now ready for her second year of college. Now, while mom and dad are repaying on "Junior" they begin to deter on "Susie"—provided, of course, that their liability is greater than that which they are deferring. Under these typical situations, taxpayers would be required to keep records for 16 years until the loan was paid off. I am not sure what kind of a form we would need to keep track of all that information. These situations become even more complex with three or more children in one family.

Treasury tells me that they will have to find a way to set up a data bank on each dependent child. In addition, they will need a better way to identify dependents, like a social security number. Currently, dependents need only to be listed on the 1040 by name and age. No one is venturing a guess if privacy regulations would be violated if further identification of students is required.

It is also important to note that when the taxpayer claims a deferral for any member of his family, the taxpayer losses the option to take the child as an exemption. By using the deferral option, the taxpayer forfeits $750 per child under the Mikva bill. Simple arithmetic here indicates the real advantage to the taxpayer under the Mikva bill.

In the case of death of the taxpayer, IRS can only collect on the loan after the estate is probated. Actually, IRS will not even be directly notified unless the estate is valued at more than $200,000. If, however, there is no money left over after probate, IRS cannot collect at all. Treasury will not collect from a widow, for example, whose only income is social security and who does not have any "blue chip stocks" at her disposal.

Bankruptcy presents an even more serious problem for IRS. The Mikva bill does not address this problem. If a taxpayer files bankruptcy, again there is no way for IRS to collect.

It is my belief that this substitute amendment is merely another way to invite fraud and abuse, as does our existing student loan programs. While IRS has a better record for collecting past tax debts, HEW has access to the same records and has not proven to be able to locate delinquent debtors. I am not sure that IRS would, under the Mikva bill, have a better success rate in locating the same kind of debtors HEW has been unable to find. I need not remind my colleagues to the great lengths a debtor will go to avoid loan repayments.

On the other hand, a tuition tax credit needs no repayment and does not lend itself to fraud and abuse. A tuition tax credit would support and complement our present Federal student aid program, not add another layer of bureaucratic redtape. Tax credits are the most effective, direct, and least complicated means to provide relief to students and parents from the increasing costs of tuition. I believe that citizens are asking for tax relief now, not just another loan program for which they are forced to repay.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK).

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the gentleman from Minnesota.

When Members in this House learn that they will be putting in peril the dependency exemption, which is the basic tax recognition for family support, I think they will give this substitute some very serious consideration.

I oppose the Mikva amendment also because it puts the long arm of the Treasury into the family, because any family with someone attending a post-secondary educational institution will have all this information about it going into a data bank for a long period of time.

I would also like to quote the opinion of the Acting Assistant Secretary of the Treasury for Tax Policy, Donald C. Lubick, as stated in his testimony before the Ways and Means Committee, when he was discussing the Mikva proposal.

Here is what he says:

> However, again we have a very serious problem of administration. In effect, families desiring loans must apply both to the IRS and to HEW. There would be serious recordkeeping problems imposed on the IRS in keeping track of loans and repayments. And perhaps most seriously, the subsidy from the loan program operates in the reverse manner of that which is most desirable.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. FRENZEL was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will continue to yield, I will quote further from Mr. Lubick's statement before the Committee on Ways and Means:

> The higher the income of the family, the higher the tax liability and therefore the higher the loan, and the more valuable the interest-saving through deferral or interest forgiveness. In other words, the effect of the loan program operating through the tax system is the reverse of that which is desirable. The [MIKVA] loan program furnishes more aid and more valuable aid at higher income levels.

I think that is a very important consideration. I think we should be very wary of taking this kind of step. I hope the Members of this committee will vote no on the Mikva proposal.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

The tuition tax credit is something that is a clean way to do things. It leaves money in the taxpayer's pocket. The Mikva deferred loan program is just another new bureaucracy, more redtape and more administration.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, we have heard a great deal of talk today about the economy of this measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

(On request of Mr. HYDE, and by unanimous consent, Mr. FRENZEL was allowed to proceed for 30 additional seconds.)

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will continue to yield, is it not, from the taxpayer's point of view a lot more economical to educate a child in a parochial school with a small tax credit, and to keep that child in that school and keep that school open, than to educate that same child in the public school where the taxpayer picks up the total tab?

Mr. FRENZEL. The gentleman is exactly right. I would say further that none of my constituents have been asking me for a loan program so they can pay the money back later. Instead of that, they have said that they would like a tax credit, because they do not have to pay it back.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

(On request of Mr. LUKEN and by unanimous consent, Mr. FRENZEL was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. LUKEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LUKEN).

Mr. LUKEN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me. Let me say that we have had a wearying debate during this debate and during the debate on the Vanik amendment, and again this House has spoken in favor of elementary and secondary education tax credits.

This is another device. I think the full House should know what we are talking about in what may be a brief debate on this amendment. I think it should be emphasized that it applies to the rich only, to the college situation and not to the elementary and secondary school education and that what we would be doing by adopting this amendment in the nature of a substitute would be to reject that which we did just a few moments ago. Is that correct?

Mr. FRENZEL. The gentleman is absolutely right.

Mr. LUKEN. It is merely a trick and a device to avoid the tuition tax credit for the elementary and secondary nonpublic schools.

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA).

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, I am sure the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LUKEN) would like to withdraw the word "trick." This proposal has been under consideration for the past 3 years and it was debated in the committee for 2 years.

Mr. LUKEN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I will withdraw the word "trick" but not the word "device." It is a device that simply imposes the proposed Presidential Middle-Income Assistance Act, which is intended only to defeat that which we first approved. I think we should vote down this amendment.

Mr. FRENZEL. The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LUKEN) is correct in stating the effect of the Mikva amendment. It eliminates all assistance to the elementary and secondary schools and scraps tuition credits for college.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman to expand on one statement he just made. If I understood what he said, the Mikva approach is merely a loan against taxes and the taxpayer has to pay all of that back with 3 percent interest. Is that correct?

Mr. FRENZEL. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. FRENZEL. The amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA) does not give you anything. It makes you pay back the money. It is just like that old statement that says "now you have it, now you don't."

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. It is similar to a subsidy on interest payments on the loan you now get from the bank, if you can get one. On the other hand, the tax credit approach is a reduction in taxes that the taxpayer has to pay, is that correct?

Mr. FRENZEL. That is correct.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the Mikva amendment and to give several reasons why I support it. I have spent a good many years of my life in institutions of higher learning as a student, teacher, trustee, insurance and retirement expert, and have put or am putting seven children through college. I think I have some feeling for this subject.

Many administrative problems have been raised against the Mikva amendment. To an extent this is true, certainly compared to the tax credit which simply excuses some of the tax bill. It has been mentioned also that the Mikva amendment is simply the long arm of the Treasury reaching into the individual's pocket. Maybe so, but the tax credit approach is the long arm of the individual reaching into the Treasury.

The Mikva amendment does provide much more assistance when the tuition crunch comes, 10 times as much help when it is really needed. Suddenly to have to ante up $1, $2, $5, $8,000 more than one did last year is rough.

Ultimately, the Mikva approach loses nothing for the Treasury. The money is collected back, and even a little more because there is an interest charge on the money. Tax deferral amounts to a low-interest 3 percent loan with a 10-year repayment period after the college years have been completed.

The tax deferral approach that we are debating here, of course, only helps those who have taxes to defer. That has to be understood. Therefore, in my view, there needs to be combined with this a grant and loan program perhaps such as we have had right along, maybe improved, to help the lower-income people, individuals and families, who will need some supplement. I believe we will have a chance to provide that kind of supplement later on. The combination of tax deferral, paid back mainly by parents, and loans and grants, paid back mainly by students, means that no one will be denied a college education because of lack of funds. This, I believe, is the proper extent of the U.S. Government's obligation to students and parents for higher education. This kind of an approach, combining the tax deferral with loan and grant for low-income people, will mean that we are saying to anybody in the country, finances need not stand in the way of your getting a college education. That is the extent of our obligation, as I see it.

A final word: There is this basic matter of requiring those who benefit from higher education and their parents to pay for this education out of their earnings, savings, and loans that they contract to repay. This, I think, is the responsible way to proceed and does test the seriousness of purpose both of the students whom we are aiding and their parents.

So I believe the Mikva approach is the best way to go. If we want to help substantially, if we really want to help substantially, this is the way to go. If we want to escape the major constitutional, budgetary, and historic problems of this bill as so far amended, then this is the way to go. If we want to lay responsibility for higher education on the students and on their parents, this is the way to do it.

Before we complete action on this matter, I urge the Members strongly to consider the tax deferral approach very carefully. This is probably the last chance we are going to have for other than a pittance tax credit that is not going to help anybody very much. I urge the Members to vote for this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(At the request of Mr. ECKHARDT, and by unanimous consent, Mr. FISHER was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. ECKHARDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISHER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. ECKHARDT. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think the gentleman has made a very fine statement. Would the gentleman not also agree that if we really want to do something for parents at a time when the crunch is the greatest, we had better pass the Mikva amendment? It avoids both the constitutional question and, frankly, I can see no difference between permitting a tax credit for money passed directly to a private religious institution and an appropriation made to such an institution. If money is not paid to the institution, the tax credit is not given. It is exactly as if the tax amount were collected and then appropriated to the religious institution. If the Constitution will not permit the latter, direct appropriation, it will not permit the former indirect passage of such funds through a tax credit.

I can see no difference; so we run a risk of unconstitutionality and also we run a risk of a veto; so if Members here really want to aid parents in paying tuition, it would seem to me, they should vote for the Mikva amendment.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman, I agree completely. We run the further risk, if we do not go the Mikva route but go the route we are headed for, of providing a pittance in aid, $50 for elementary and secondary education and $100 for college, going up a little bit over the next 2 or 3 years. That is not going to do the job.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISHER. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, I just want to compliment the gentleman on his statement and especially on what he has just said. I think that is the nub of the issue.

I have a different view than does the gentleman from Texas (Mr. ECKHARDT) and the gentleman in the well (Mr. FISHER) on the constitutionality question and the Vanik amendment, which I supported; but the gentleman is making the right point about college aid. The Mikva approach, like the one which the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. STEIGER) and I have introduced, and which will be considered later, gives people the dollars they need.

This tuition tax credit proposal is not much practical help at all because it emphatically does not give people the dollars they need.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman, it gives the people the dollars they need when they need it.

Mr. KETCHUM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. KETCHUM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA) and myself. Like my friend, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA) I deeply resent the comment that this is a trick or a device. This bill, had it not been for the fact that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means abstained from voting, would have been the bill before us on the floor and we would have been trying to amend it in the other direction.

The vote on the Mikva amendment was 18 to 18.

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHUM. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is calling it the Vanik amendment. The gentleman means the Mikva amendment, I am sure.

Mr. KETCHUM. I did not mean the Vanik amendment. I meant the Mikva amendment.

You see, it is so confusing to notice the alliances that have been effected over this issue. You can tell this is not a partisan issue. Good night, we have the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) on the one side chumming up with the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL), and the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA) with me. It is almost astounding; so it is a little difficult to keep track where we are.

This is not a partisan issue. The reason I stated a moment ago is the only reason that this proposal is not the proposal that we are discussing.

Now, I do not criticize in any way the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means for abstaining from voting on this particular issue, because the gentleman had made a commitment to bring the tuition tax credit bill to the floor and I respect the gentleman for that.

I think it is well known that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means opposes this.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to address myself for just a moment or two on the complexity of deferrals vis-a-vis tax credits. Mr. Lubick, who is the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury did, indeed, say this would be very complicated; but I would remind my colleagues that he said the same thing about tuition tax credit.

The IRS does not want anything, nor does the administration, which has threatened to veto this bill. I hope there is no one on this floor that has voted for the past two amendments thinking that the bill may be vetoed. The President said he is going to veto it, but he said a lot of things he has changed his mind on.

So we should not feel safe along those lines. The Mikva-Ketchum amendment offers 10 times the relief to individuals who are sending their children to college—10 times the relief.

Yes, to be sure, they have to pay the money back, but they have 10 years to do it. As my friend, the gentleman from California (Mr. DANIELSON), commented, the only reason this proposal may not pass is that it is, No. 1, too simple; No. 2, too equitable; and No. 3, too fiscally responsible.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the Members to vote for this deferral proposal.

Mr. EVANS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHUM. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. EVANS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the gentleman from California (Mr. KETCHUM). I am going to vote for this amendment.

I do not have to worry about what the people back home think of my vote on this amendment, because I have decided not to run for reelection. But putting myself in the shoes of the gentleman from California (Mr. KETCHUM), the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA), and the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK), I will guarantee you that if I was running for reelection, I for darned sure would vote for this amendment.

The idea of going home and trying to make my farmers, ranchers, businessmen, and union friends feel good by telling them they are going to get a $50 credit for primary and secondary education and up to $100 for a college education would not give me much comfort, and I think I would get run out of town if I supported such a proposal. But if I could go back and say, "Those of you who are paying educational bills for college—and they are whopping—are, under this amendment, going to be able to get up to $1,000 per student per year while you are supporting your kids in college," I think I would really be telling them something that would make them happy.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from California (Mr. KETCHUM) will yield, would the gentleman tell his constituents about the $750 exemption they are going to lose?

Mr. EVANS of Colorado. They are not going to lose their $750 exemption.

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHUM. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, let us get that exemption matter straight.

As in the bill that is before the House, there are choices that the taxpayer has to make. If he takes the tuition tax credit, he has to give up the deduction that he would otherwise take as a business deduction for education purposes.

Under the proposal that I have sponsored with the gentleman from California (Mr. KETCHUM), for the year that they take the deferral, if they take it, they choose whether they want the deferral or the exemption. If the exemption is worth more, they take that; if the deferral is worth more, they take that. Obviously the deferral is worth more in most instances.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. KETCHUM) has expired.

(On request of Mr. VANIK, and by unanimous consent, Mr. KETCHUM was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHUM. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA) tell me about this loss of a business deduction if someone gets the tuition credit. The gentleman made a statement, and I just want to find out if we can get to the bottom of it. Maybe I am learning something new about the code.

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHUM. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) will hand me a copy of the bill, I will be happy to explain it.

Mr. VANIK. I will hand the gentleman a copy of the code.

Mr. MIKVA. Try the bill.

Mr. KETCHUM. Mr. Chairman, I can only say, while I am waiting for the gentlemen to proceed, that I am certainly glad I am not a member of the Democratic caucus.

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, let me read from section (h), as follows:

DISALLOWANCE OF CREDITED EXPENSES AS CREDIT OR DEDUCTION.—No deduction or credit shall be allowed under any other section of this chapter for any amount paid for tuition for any individual except to the extent that such amount exceeds the amount necessary for the allowance of the maximum amount which may be allowed under this section for tuition for such individual for the taxable year.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, let me ask the gentleman, how many people are involved in that?

Mr. MIKVA. How many people are involved in receiving the deduction?

Mr. VANIK. Are there more than there are fingers on your hand?

Mr. MIKVA. I do not know.

Mr. VANIK. Of course, not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. KETCHUM) has expired.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to find out whether we might agree on some time within which we may conclude debate on this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment in the nature of a substitute conclude at 5:30 p.m.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Members standing at the time of the unanimous-consent request will each be recognized for 45 seconds.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. CORMAN).

Mr. CORMAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from California (Mr.

KETCHUM) is present, because I agree with everything he said except one thing. The gentleman said he is glad he is not a member of our Democratic caucus. Many times I wish he were.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment is a sound approach.

It helps the people who need help the most, and those are the people who cannot go down to the bank and borrow the money because they do not have enough security to satisfy the bank. But they can take it off of their income tax until they get their kids through school.

Mr. Chairman, I urge a yes vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. COUGHLIN).

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I object to the theory of this amendment which considers the Government owns all of the money and it will give you some back for a loan. In addition, this is a tax-raising measure, because not only do you have to pay the money back, but you lose your personal exemption, as well.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the defeat of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK).

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I cannot help but think that this reminds me somewhat of the homestead amendment in many States. They make a great big deal over the fact that they were going to help the retired person, that he was not going to have to pay as much in property tax. But when it was finally written, all it did was to say you could forego the taxes until you died and then the State would tell the estate that they owed the money back.

Mr. Chairman, if we are going to help somebody but they have to pay it back with interest, I think we ought to look ourselves square in the face and say: Is this just another Homestead Act for college students? At least don't make any big deal out of it.

I think that is what we are talking about.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. MITCHELL).

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Mikva amendment.

Mr. Chairman, my colleagues in the House earlier on came perilously close to unraveling the Constitution of the United States. Here, under this amendment, we have an opportunity not only to avoid that kind of a menace to the basic document which governs this land, but also to give a fair and just break to those people who have children in school.

The Mikva amendment makes admirable good sense.

There has been some talk about all of the problems with the Department of the Treasury administering this Mikva amendment. I would rather give them the problems of administering the amendment than to wreck the Constitution, which has guided us so well and so long as a document worthy of our support.

Mr. Chairman, I support the Mikva-Ketchum amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SAWYER).

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Chairman, I have just a couple of comments to make.

As a long-time, very substantial taxpayer, it disturbs me to hear this body say that if you are giving someone a tax credit you are giving them some money. You are just not taking as much of the money that they earned away from them.

Second, many people who rose and said that this is a mere pittance, namely the $100 to $250 under the Vanik amendment voted to spend $20 billion for a $50 tax refund.

So the pittance argument did not, apparently, impress them very much at that time.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. DANIELSON yielded his time to Mr. MIKVA.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. PANETTA).

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, this has been a long debate, and many issues have been raised.

I think the tax deferral approach really addresses those issues. It is preferable from a constitutional point of view, because of the difficult constitutional question raised with regard to the tax credit. It is preferable from the point of view of cost of the Federal Government, and it is preferable because it provides meaningful relief to those who need it.

Mr. Chairman, I think for those reasons it ought to be supported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. STEIGER).

Mr. STEIGER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the Chair for rerecognizing me.

This is a terrible choice to make since the amendment is a substitute for the whole bill. I really do believe that we should extend credits for the elementary and secondary education and yet, I must say the deferral concept which the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA) and the gentleman from California (Mr. KETCHUM) have proposed, in my judgment, is by far the most rational, sensible way to handle the most serious problem. The problem is the cash-flow problem for students in postsecondary institutions.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I will support the Mikva amendment. I do so, I must say, while finding myself in a difficult position. But if the Mikva amendment is adopted a bill can go to conference and it is then possible to have credits for elementary and secondary education while providing effective assistance to enrollees in postsecondary schools. Thus, Mr. Chairman, I think the Mikva amendment ought to be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LUKEN).

Mr. LUKEN. Mr. Chairman, I think the only concern here is that the House should be caught off guard because in sitting through this debate all day, I heard very little support generally for the Mikva amendment. It is only since the Vanik amendment was passed that support arises or some support arises for the Mikva amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think we should stick to the decision that we made just an hour ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, if we pass the Mikva amendment, we will be eliminating elementary and secondary tuition tax credits. We will be eliminating college tuition tax credits.

What we will have left is a tax increase because everyone who takes that deferred loan will give up the personal exemption and, therefore, will be paying more taxes than he or she would have been paying before.

Mr. Chairman, a person should not give up a tax credit simply to take a deal in which he or she has to pay back the loan, and then lose the exemption too. Meanwhile, that poor taxpayer is picking up all the administrative problems and redtape that the Treasury would like to avoid.

Mr. Chairman, let us vote down the Mikva amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA).

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, there have been an awful lot of figures thrown around here.

Obviously, this is not a tax increase. If it were a tax increase, it would not have the revenue outgo that it has in the early years. It is, as the gentleman from Minnesota earlier described it, a loan secured by taxes deferred; and in that respect, it provides more cash help at the time of need and less adverse impact on the Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, the Members of this House have been around this horn often enough to know what the real political considerations are with the other body, the Senate. The Senate revenue committee has passed a bill providing tuition tax credits at a cost of about $5.3 billion in 1983.

Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is defeated and we pass the bill with the Vanik amendment in it, the conference will be between the figure we have and the figure the Senate has. One does not have to be a 20-term veteran to know that it will come out somewhere around $3 billion or $4 billion a year in tax revenue impact.

This bill, on the other hand, has a much lower impact even during its heaviest years, and ultimately provides for bringing the money back. It provides the most bang for the least amount of tax dollars.

Mr. Chairman, many concerns have been expressed about the size of our deficit and about the problem we are trying to solve. It seems to me this amendment makes more sense on both those counts. I urge its adoption.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) to close debate.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that a deferral plan such as is suggested by my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA), has the effect of providing very, very little incentive for education. It does very, very little for the many people in urban areas who would utilize in the private schools as a matter of choice. It is 180 degrees around from what we are trying to do in reforming the tax law.

The old adage is that taxes deferred are taxes lost. I think the estimates that have been given about the cost of the Mikva proposal are critically underestimated. If we defer those taxes, there is a pretty good chance that revenue will be forever lost. Then we will compound the cost of that program.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the members of this committee to vote against the Mikva amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM FOR TONIGHT AND TOMORROW

(Mr. RHODES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute).

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to inquire of the distinguished majority leader as to the program for the balance of the evening and for tomorrow, if he is in a position to divulge that information to the House.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RHODES. I yield to the majority leader.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, it is our purpose now to take up the bill H.R. 12157, the Export-Import Bank authorization. That probably will consume the remainder of today.

We would plan to rise and have adjournment this evening at or about 9 o'clock.

On tomorrow we would continue with the schedule, taking up the bill H.R. 15, the Elementary and Secondary Education Act amendments, and depending upon the availability of time we would continue with what other items remain unfinished on this week's schedule, namely, the Intelligence authorization, the Solar Power Research and Development authorization, and the Water Rights for the Ak-Chin Indians.

I would expect it to be rather unlikely that we could finish all those by tomorrow, but that is the plan.

Mr. RHODES. It is my understanding that it is the intention of the majority to rise tomorrow at 3 and to adjourn for the week.

Mr. WRIGHT. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. RHODES. In which event, I agree with the gentleman, it would be quite unlikely that all of the material, rather voluminous and I hope important, would be concluded by 3 p.m. tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. WRIGHT. Hope springs eternal but reality usually takes over. I think the gentleman is probably correct in his estimation. We will just get as far as we can.

The gentleman is sufficiently aware of the problems that confront the House in our attempts to plow through and finish the work of the authorizing legislation so we can clear the decks for consideration of the important appropriations bills that soon will be ready for our consideration.

Mr. RHODES. The minority is well aware of the problems of the majority and insofar as possible intends to be cooperative.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RHODES. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. STANTON).

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to ask the majority leader this.

It is my understanding we have about 20 amendments pending on the Export-Import bill, and just in the likelihood we did not finish by 9 o'clock, is it the gentleman's intention to bring this legislation back tomorrow morning?

Mr. WRIGHT. It is an open rule with 1 hour of general debate. If the general debate is not too generous and Members are diligent and attentive, perhaps we can conclude that bill this evening. That would be the hope of the leadership. If it is not done, then we would attempt to look at it again tomorrow.

Mr. RHODES. May I pursue that a moment further? It is the intent of the majority that in the event the Export-Import Bank bill is not finished today that it would be the pending business for tomorrow and it would be taken up prior to anything else?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, that is our intention, to follow the schedule as it is written.

Mr. RHODES. I thank the gentleman.

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 12157, AMENDING AND EXTENDING THE EXPORT-IMPORT BANK ACT OF 1945

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 1168 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 1168

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 12157) to amend and extend the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI). The gentleman from Florida (Mr. PEPPER) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the usual 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) for the purpose of debate only, pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 1168 provides for the consideration of H.R. 12157, a bill amending and extending the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945. This resolution provides for an open rule with 1 hour of general debate to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 12157, to amend the Export-Import Act of 1945, extends the U.S. Export-Import Bank for 5 years, through 1983, and increases its commitment authority from $25 billion to $40 billion for this same period.

The Export-Import Bank is an independent Government agency, which provides loans, loan guarantees, and insurance to American exporters—lessening their risk factors and thereby enhancing the competitive advantage of U.S. products overseas.

The Bank, while fully backed by the U.S. Treasury, is in fact self-supporting and has never required appropriations from Congress. It is, therefore, important to note that the increase in the Bank's commitment authority will not result in the actual appropriation of additional funds. It will, on the other hand, strengthen considerably the role of the Bank in the promotion of foreign trade. An increase in our share of the world market has been established by the administration as a high priority objective, and is one fully deserving of congressional support.

We all recognize, I know, the seriousness of our chronic trade deficit—which reached an alarming $27 billion last year—and share a commitment to reduce our oil import bill. We must also approach the problem from the other angle, and increase our exports which have been lagging badly for several years, despite a depreciating dollar.

A more aggressive Export-Import Bank should help U.S. businesses fulfill their sales potential abroad. With that in mind, section 7 of the bill specifically directs the bank to assist small businesses in entering the agricultural export market.

I would like to mention a couple of other significant provisions included in this legislation. First of all, section 5 prohibits the bank from participating in any transaction in the Republic of South Africa until substantial progress toward the elimination of apartheid has been determined to have taken place by the President. This is a welcome measure and one that will aline the bank's policies more closely with this country's policy of backing majority rule and civil rights for the peoples of Africa.

Second, section 6 of H.R. 12157 lifts restrictions on business with the People's Republic of China although any transactions with that country will remain subject to human rights criteria and all other determinations that the bank must make before undertaking commerce with foreign countries.

Before concluding, I would like to call your attention to an amendment that will be offered on the floor by Representative CAVANAUGH, a member of the Banking Committee. The gentleman's amendment would provide for an evaluation by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission of the safety of the design and site of nuclear power plants which the bank finances overseas. I strongly support this concept and urge my colleagues to adopt this needed safeguard in our nuclear export policy.

This bill is one step in the battle to restore a strong U.S. economy both at home and abroad, and I urge you to adopt the rule providing for immediate consideration of H.R. 12157. I request that we adopt House Resolution 1168 so that we may proceed to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, This rule provides one hour of general debate for the consideration of H.R. 12157 to extend and amend the Export-Import Bank Act. The bill will be open to all germane amendments. There are no waivers of points of order in the rule.

Mr. Speaker, the bill made in order by this rule extends the Export-Import Bank for 5 years, through September 30, 1983 and increases its financing commitments authority from $25 billion to $40 billion.

While the rule contains no controversial provisions, Mr. Speaker, the same cannot be said for the bill.

In addition to extending the Act and increasing the limit on bank commitments, this bill contains at least two controversial provisions.

First, this bill prohibits the Export-Import Bank from participating in any transaction in the Republic of South Africa until significant progress toward the elimination of apartheid has been determined by the President.

A second controversial provision exempts the Peoples Republic of China from the provision requiring a presidential determination before the bank may do business in a Communist country.

Mr. Speaker, I support the rule in order that the House may work its will on the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California, Mr. ROUSSELOT.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, my vote against this legislation does not reflect a final judgment on my part as to the utility and desirability of continued assistance by the Export-Import Bank in financing U.S. exports. The ability of this country to compete in world markets depends primarily on the underlying productivity of the economy. Export subsidies cannot compensate for the damage which excessive taxation and regulation and irresponsible fiscal and monetary policies of the Federal Government have done to the ability of the United States to compete against other major industrial powers.

There is some justification for continuing Eximbank's support for exports in order to offset the effects of aggressive export support programs conducted by a number of our major trading partners, but the interest of free international trade would be better served in my judgment, by the phasing out of all export subsidy facilities. The full committee endorsed this objective when it adopted the Leach amendment. That amendment recognizes the fact that the so-called gentleman's agreements negotiations have ended without significant progress toward harmonizing export credit rates and terms, and it instructs the administration to reopen the negotiations at the ministerial level to put an end, once and for all, to predatory export financing and other export credit subsidies.

Assuming that export subsidies should be continued for a time, I cannot support the hypothetical position taken by this committee that export credits should be cut off from the Republic of South Africa in the name of promoting "human rights" at the same time that credits are extended to the so-called People's Republic of China, which is undeniably one of the most repressive regimes on Earth, in the name of promoting international trade.

My strenuous objection to this bill does not mean that I believe human rights considerations are irrelevant to issues of international trade and foreign assistance. On the contrary, I have consistently supported denial of export subsidies to Communist countries which deny their citizens the freedom to emigrate. It is my strong belief that American taxpayers should not be asked to subsidize the export of American goods to countries which deny this most basic human right. Human rights policies which are thoughtfully developed and consistently applied can be used effectively to promote the achievement of human liberty and to demonstrate that the United States does not condone the fact that in Soviet Russia, Red China, Cambodia, Uganda, and numerous other countries people are being enslaved and oppressed to an extent which is reminiscent of the Holocaust.

By extending credit and friendship to Red China at the same time that the Republic of South Africa is singled out for punitive treatment, this committee is saying, in effect, that a country which denies virtually all human rights to all but a handful of its citizens in the name of Communist ideology is to be preferred to a country which has admittedly denied to many of its people full enjoyment of the benefits of a free society but which seeks the support of the United States for its efforts to remedy the inequities which exist.

The policies which this committee has taken with respect to Red China and South Africa are so inconsistent and wrongheaded that objective observers are bound to wonder just what the United States is trying to accomplish in the field of human rights. If this bill becomes law, it will make a mockery of years of bipartisan efforts on behalf of human rights, efforts which began long before the present President and his United Nations Ambassador came on the scene. This would be highly regrettable, and I urge my colleagues to support amendments to be offered on the floor which will be designed to extricate the committee and the Congress from this predicament.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 15, EDUCATION AMENDMENTS OF 1978

Mrs. CHISHOLM. Mr. Speaker, by direction of Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 1208 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 1208

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution, it shall be in order to move, section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-344) to the contrary notwithstanding, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 15) to extend for five years certain elementary, secondary, and other education programs. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Education and Labor, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Education and Labor now printed in the bill as an original bill for the purpose of amendment under the five-minute rule, said substitute shall be read for amendment by titles instead of by sections, and all points of order against said substitute for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 7, rule XVI, clause 5, rule XXI, and section 401(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-344) are hereby waived. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and any Member may demand a separate vote in the House on any amendment adopted to the bill or to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlewoman from New York (Mrs. CHISHOLM) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mrs. CHISHOLM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. DEL CLAWSON), pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mrs. CHISHOLM. Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 1208 provides for the consideration of H.R. 15, the Education Amendments of 1978. This bill extends for 5 years with amendment a number of programs which comprise the major portion of Federal aid to our Nation's elementary and secondary schools.

This is a routine open rule, with 2 hours of general debate, providing that the bill be read for amendments by title rather than by section.

Briefly, the resolution waives points of order under sections 402(a) and 401 (a) of the Congressional Budget Act. H.R. 15, as originally introduced, would have authorized the Commissioner of Education to make grants to State educational agencies upon enactment, which would be in violation of the May 15 deadline. However, in markup, the Committee on Education and Labor adopted an amendment curing this Budget Act violation. Since a point of order would still lie against the original bill, it is necessary to waive section 402 (a) in order to permit the bill's consideration.

Further, section 401(a) limits the authorization of contract authority, unless the bill specifies that such authority is to be effective for any fiscal year only to the extent that such amounts are provided in appropirations acts. The Committee on Education and Labor has agreed to offer a committee amendment limiting this authority as required by the Budget Act.

Consequently, Chairman GIAIMO of the Budget Committe has expressed his willingness to approve these waivers which will permit the House to consider H.R. 15 and the proposed committee amendment.

Mr. Speaker, and my fellow colleagues, H.R. 15 has three basic features:

First, it retains the approach which has characterized Federal aid to education since its inception—the retention and enhancement of categorical programs for specific groups and purposes as opposed to unrestricted block grants.

Second, within this framework, H.R. 15 does a great deal to simplify Federal education programs, and make their requirements more understandable. Further provisions of this bill will provide better coordination between the many programs which exist, and will greatly reduce the amount of paperwork involved.

Third, this bill expands and improves existing educational programs, while incorporating new efforts which address needs that are not being adequately met through our present programs.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation before us this evening has undergone a full and vigorous review by the Education and Labor Committee. There were over 75 days of hearings, and without question, these programs have come under closer congressional scrutiny than at any time since their inception.

The most prominent program reauthorized under H.R. 15 is title I—compensatory education, our major Federal effort to aid in the education of America's 9 million disadvantaged children. Although in the past the impact of this program has frequently been slighted unfairly, last year the National Institute of Education (NIE) released a major congressional mandated 2-year study of the impact of compensatory education. I am pleased that NIE's findings show that title I is a success, educational achievement of disadvantaged students is markedly increased by the supplemental educational services they receive. For each month that a student is in title I, he or she makes approximately 1 month of academic progress. Approximately 80 percent of these title I funds are used to provide instructional services in the basic skills. The only weakness which we can find in title I is that it is being under funded. At the present appropriation's level, only some 60 percent of the presently eligible children are being served. Almost 3 million disadvantaged students who are eigible for title I are not able to receive them due to the program's underfunding. Consequently, we have found that substantial gains made by these students during their early years in title I are offset by lags in achievement during later academic years, since title I services are often not available beyond the third or fourth grade.

In response to the administration's and the committee's appreciation of this problem, there is in this bill an authorization for a new concentration fund in title I which would target an additional $400 million into urban, rural, and suburban areas with severe impactions of poverty. Under this formula concentration funds will flow to approximately two-thirds of the eligible children nationwide.

I urge my colleagues to adopt House Resolution 1208 so that we might proceed to consider H.R. 15, a critical piece of legislation which is the principal mechanism for providing Federal assistance to State and local school systems which educate America's children.

Mr. DEL CLAWSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 1208 provides for the consideration of H.R. 15, amending the Elementary and Secondary Education Act. This is a rule allowing 2 hours of debate. The committee substitute is made in order as an original bill for the purpose of amendment. During the amendment process, the bill is to be read by titles instead of by sections.

The resolution contains several waivers. First, section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act is waived because the original bill authorizes new budget authority for fiscal year 1978 in violation of the 1974 Budget Act. A committee amendment, however, was adopted in markup curing that violation. Second, all points of order are waived which may lie against the bill for failure to comply with clause 7, rule 16, the germaneness rule for nongermane provisions in the committee substitute. Third, clause 5, rule 21, is waived which prohibits appropriations in a legislative measure. Finally, points of order are waived for section 401(a) of the Budget Act for the bill's failure to comply with its provisions. Section 401(a) prohibits consideration of any bill which provides new contract authority, which the original bill does. I am advised that the Committee on Education and Labor will offer a floor amendment limiting this new contract authority to the extent provided in advance in appropriation acts, which would have the effect of rendering this a technical waiver. In addition, one motion will be in order to recommit with or without instructions.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 15 provides many different revisions and extensions of ESEA programs through 1983. This rule as described, contains waivers, but I am not aware of any organized opposition.

Mrs. CHISHOLM. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

AMENDING AND EXTENDING THE EXPORT-IMPORT BANK ACT OF 1945

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 12157) to amend and extend the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. NEAL).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ASHBROOK) there were—yeas 73, nays 23.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 314, nays 13, not voting 107, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 12157, with Mr. MINETA in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. NEAL) will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. STANTON) will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. NEAL).

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, the bill now before us, H.R. 12157, would reauthorize the Export-Import Bank of the United States through September 1983, and increase its financing commitment authority from $25 billion to $40 billion.

This legislation offers us one way to take immediate action—without appropriations and without requiring public sacrifices—to improve the health of our economy.

By passing this bill, we can give the Carter administration the financing authority needed to make the Eximbank more effective in stimulating the sale of American goods and services overseas.

If this country can increase its exports, we can reduce our persistent foreign trade deficit, strengthen the dollar's value around the world, and create thousands of urgently needed jobs in the United States. For every $1 billion of exports, an estimated 35,000 to 58,000 jobs are created here.

Increasing exports is one immediate way to attack the trade deficit, which is one of our more serious economic problems. In 1977, the United States purchased approximately $31 billion more goods than we sold on the world market. One of the principal causes of this deficit, of course, was the $45 billion we spent on oil imports. We have now had deficits for 22 consecutive months. And with each month, the dollar's value abroad erodes a little more.

A declining dollar, in turn, makes our imports of oil, consumer goods, and vital raw materials more expensive. This contributes to our already serious domestic inflation and leads to even larger trade deficits, which further weaken confidence in the dollar. It is a dangerous cycle. We must act to break it.

To get our economy in order, of course, we will have to discipline ourselves enough to reduce our consumption of foreign oil and to hold down inflation. In the meantime, though, we can help ourselves a great deal by selling more products abroad.

The Eximbank, created by Congress in 1934, stimulates exports by helping American companies arrange the competitive credit terms needed to attract foreign customers. By providing direct loans, loan guarantees, and insurance at critical times, the Eximbank makes possible many oversea sales that otherwise might not have been made. The Bank assists in the sale of about 10 percent of this country's exports. It does not finance imports, nor does it finance the exports of any other country.

The Bank does not compete with private capital. In fact, by assuming certain political and commercial risks, the Eximbank enables many private banks and companies to finance export trade.

One of the Bank's most endearing qualities is that it pays its own way. It requires no appropriations from Congress. It charges market-related interest rates and is completely self-supporting. In fact, the Eximbank pays about $50 million in annual dividends to the U.S. Treasury.

The Eximbank is not a foreign aid program in any sense; nor is it an international development bank. It is a hard-nosed business institution. Its benefits go to American companies, who are enabled to make additional sales abroad, and to the workers whose jobs depend on export sales. It benefits all of us by producing jobs, profits, and foreign exchange.

In an ideal world, of course, the U.S. Government should not have to provide this kind of service to exporters. But the reality is that our major competitors in world trade—especially Japan and France—provide not only Government-backed financing but other subsidies to help their companies make sales. Because we value our free enterprise economy and because we want to promote the cause of free trade, we refuse to resort to massive subsidies. We would prefer to compete on the basis of the quality, price, and service our companies offer. But until other trading nations agree to do the same, we must be prepared to meet the competition. And one of the main elements of competition is official financing of the kind offered by the Eximbank.

This legislation instructs the appropriate officials of our Government to continue to seek agreements by which trading nations will abandon predatory financing schemes, subsidies, and other unfair trade devices. But if the negotiations are unsuccessful, the Eximbank will be encouraged to be as aggressive as necessary to meet the competition.

I commend the Carter administration for its plan to use the Eximbank more effectively. And I hope that my colleagues will support this legislation to strengthen the bank. The bill has broad bipartisan support in the Subcommittee on International Trade, Investment and Monetary Policy and on the full Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs. It was approved 15 to 2 by the subcommittee and 30 to 5 by the full committee.

Much attention has been given to provisions in the bill barring Eximbank services on sales to South Africa and removing one barrier to future bank participation in transactions with the People's Republic of China. These are important issues, and they will be debated fully here. But I hope that you will keep in mind that the overriding purpose of the bill is to make American companies more competitive on the world market.

As I noted earlier, section 1 of the bill would reauthorize the Bank for 5 years through September, 1983, and increase its commitment authority from $25 billion to $40 billion. This should leave no doubt in the international community that the United States is serious about increasing its export business through the Eximbank.

Section 2 reduces the delay in the 25-legislative day review period caused by congressional adjournment of at least 10 days. It enables the Bank to continue supporting highly competitive large-scale exports during adjournments while at the same time complying with our review requirements.

Section 3 brings the Bank's activities into compliance with the requirements of the Budget Act. It formalizes the appropriation procedures that have been in effect for several years.

Section 4 of the bill complements a provision we passed last year when we instructed the Bank in cooperation with other appropriate Government agencies to seek to reduce competition among its foreign counterparts and to reduce the Government subsidized export financing. Section 4 elevates these negotiations to the level of finance minister and expands the negotiations to include predatory export financing programs.

Section 5 also stems in part from a provision we enacted last year. For over a year now the Bank has been subject to human rights restrictions that have allowed it to be responsive to the needs of U.S. exporters and to the moral dictates of our foreign policy. Section 5 goes a step further by prohibiting the Bank from participating in any transactions in the Republic of South Africa unless and until the President notifies Congress that significant progress toward the elimination of apartheid has occurred.

Section 6 exempts the People's Republic of China from the provisions prohibiting the Bank from supporting the transactions to Communist countries unless the President determines that it is in the national interest to do so. Even though no Presidential determination would be required for the Bank to support a transaction to the PRC, the Bank's own human rights restrictions would still have to be evaluated and the Jackson-Vanik restrictions would also be in effect.

Section 7 directs the Bank to gear its agricultural program to assisting new and small business entrants in the agricultural export market.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the distinguished gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I fully support the bill.

I commend the subcommittee chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. NEAL) and the ranking minority members of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. STANTON), for their hard work in bringing to the floor a serviceable bill.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 12157 seeks to stimulate the sale of more American goods and services overseas by reauthorizing the Export-Import Bank of the United States for 5 years and increasing its commitment authority from $25 billion to $40 billion.

This legislation has strong, bipartisan support on the Banking Committee, which passed it by a vote of 30 to 5 on May 1. Earlier, the bill was approved by a vote of 15 to 2 by the Subcommittee on International Trade, Investment and Monetary Policy.

Quite aside from the spirited debate over the human rights provisions attached to this bill, the committee also recognized the need to strengthen the Eximbank. The human rights debate is a recurrent one in this House, and one which has called on all Members to decide just what the human rights policy of this country should be.

Whatever human rights policies prevail today, U.S. exporters simply must become more competitive in the international marketplace—to reduce our chronic trade deficit, to strengthen the dollar's value abroad and to create badly needed jobs and profits in our economy.

The Eximbank can help by working with American companies in arranging competitive credit terms for foreign customers. The bank provides loans, guarantees, and insurance to finance sales that otherwise would not be made.

It assumes certain political and financial risks in a way that makes private banks and companies more willing to engage in international trade. And none of these services requires the appropriation of new funds; the bank makes a good profit and supports itself. In fact, it returns $50 million to the Treasury each year.

Of course, this Nation also must reduce its oil imports, and must control inflation, if it hopes to shore up the dollar and to improve our economic health. But an acceleration of exports would be one immediate way to alleviate some of our problems.

The Banking Committee has drafted a strong bill that will give the Eximbank the financing authority it needs to make U.S. companies more competitive. It sends a signal to the world that the United States is serious about increasing its exports. The Carter administration has promised to use this new authority to make the Bank more aggressive. In fact, the Eximbank is expected to be a major element in the administration's effort to upgrade all of this country's export promotion programs.

The subcommittee chairman, Mr. NEAL of North Carolina, and the ranking minority member, Mr. STANTON of Ohio, are to be commended for their leadership in bringing this bill to the floor.

It is rare that we have the opportunity to vote for a Federal program that can accomplish so much at no cost to the taxpayer—a program which in fact returns a profit to the taxpayer, increases exports and provides jobs for American workers.

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I join in complimenting the committee and the subcommittee chairman and the ranking minority member of the subcommittee for producing what I think is on balance an excellent piece of legislation that will do precisely what the subcommittee chairman just said—to signal our trading partners in the world and the international community that the United States is serious about this question of international trade and that it intends to gear up its internal machinery in such a way as to compete in the world trading arena effectively with our trading competitors in marketing American goods abroad.

This legislation achieves that purpose. It is only a small step forward in terms of overcoming the record quarterly trade deficits this country has suffered the last year or more, but it is a meaningful step and one that I think we do great credit to ourselves in passing.

So, Mr. Chairman, I want to join in support of the legislation, particularly because of the new ground that it breaks in dealing with trading with parts of the world that I think represent vast market opportunities for our exporters. I think it will do a great amount of good in terms of expanding the statistics in our own economy that indicate today only 1 percent of the corporations of our country are significantly engaged in exports. I think we can expand that greatly. This bill is an important beginning.

I urge the support of my colleagues for this legislation.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS).

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. AUCOIN).

I might add, Mr. Chairman, that 3 years ago I represented the committee in a conference on international banking and foreign trade in Germany. The message of that conference was that there are enormous trading opportunities for the United States around the world. The Eximbank has done a good job in at least keeping us in some kind of sustained position to exploit those opportunities and this bill is a good step forward in maximizing that potential. I commend the chairman of the subcommittee the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. NEAL) for the job he has done as well.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Washington (Mr. CUNNINGHAM).

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, while I do not agree with all of the provisions of H.R. 12157, which is before the House today, it is generally a much needed piece of legislation.

Jobs for American workers can be preserved by the passage of this bill. In Washington's Seventh Congressional District, which I am proud to represent, we are blessed with the finest work force in the Nation. Many of these people build commercial jets for the Boeing Co.

Not long ago, Robert Bradford, executive director of the Seattle Professional Engineering Employees Association (SPEEA) wrote me to express his support for continued and expanded Eximbank funding. He termed the legislation "extremely important to us" and I could not agree with him more.

SPEEA president Rudy Schaad, in his letter to Subcommittee Chairman Neal of North Carolina, said that SPEEA "which is the bargaining unit for 15,000 engineering and technical employees of the Boeing Co.—supports this legislation." In his letter of March 14, 1978, Mr. Schaad continued—

> (T)his legislation is important to us since more than 70 percent of the Boeing commercial aircraft sales during the past four years has been for the export market. The Eximbank has participated in over 60 percent of the dollar volume of commercial aircraft export sales. These export sales are essential to Boeing and result in continued employment for our members.

As it is easy to see, Mr. Chairman, this legislation is vital to protect and provide jobs for people in the Seventh Congressional District. The $900 million sale of Boeing jets to Singapore Airlines, just last week, illustrates the need for such financing.

Recently, Eastern Airlines purchased the A–300 airbus from France. The manufacturer made a very sweet financial deal to encourage the purchase. They did so because, as is the case in so many foreign industries, direct Government subsidies and underwriting of financing unfairly gives the advantage to overseas manufacturers. Continued and expanded Eximbank funding allows us to stop exporting employment.

Mr. Chairman, we can and must compete. Our trump card is the outstanding ability and dedication of the American aircraft worker. Of course, we are also the leaders in technology, which will result in quieter planes, flying with a lower fuel consumption.

However, as Mr. Schaad wrote,

> "Eximbank financing will help U.S. aircraft manufacturers to meet this competition. Furthermore, without commercial aircraft export sales, the U.S. trade deficit will be substantially larger."

As Mr. Bradford and Mr. Schaad have said, this legislation is needed now. I do wish that provisions which are punitive to America's allies, who are good customers for our aircraft industry products, would be removed by the House or stricken in conference.

On balance, Mr. Chairman, the legislation is needed and I urge my colleagues to support it, because it makes good sense for our economy, allowing America to work, by keeping Americans working.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I am consume.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to echo the remarks made by the distinguished chairman of the International Trade Subcommittee in favor of this measure. As mentioned by Chairman NEAL, this legislation extends Eximbank's life 5 years until 1983 and increases its commitment authority from $25 to $40 billion. This large dollar increase is premised on a projected growth in U.S. exports averaging 10 percent a year during this period. This is perhaps an optimistic assumption, but all of us who have seen the recent figures for our balance of trade deficit hope that these forecasts are correct.

Five years is also critical. Businessmen planning investments for plant expansions to serve export markets need some assurance that competitive financing will be available when those investments come on line. Foreign buyers also want some assurance that the United States will be a reliable supplier for some time to come.

In my view, this is one of the most important pieces of international legislation to be taken up by the House this year. It is not an exaggeration to suggest that a vote for the Eximbank is a vote for jobs, for improvement of our balance of payments position, and for safeguarding the ability of U.S. industry to compete abroad.

The Department of Labor estimates that every $1 billion of exports means 40,000 jobs in the United States. This means that over the last 5 years, the Eximbank has created or sustained 500,000 jobs, solely as a result of their export financing programs. It is a remarkable fact that Eximbank is able to do all of this without using taxpayers' money. As you know, Mr. Chairman, Eximbank borrows from the Treasury at Government rates and relends to buyers of U.S. exports. They even earn a profit for the Government, and last year Eximbank remitted $35 million in dividends to the U.S. Treasury. Since they were formed in 1945, Eximbank has paid back nearly $1 billion to the Government, which was the amount of their orginal capitalization.

The continued existence of Eximbank is supported by the overwhelming majority of the House; but, as all of my colleagues know, there are two subsidiary issues which are addressed in this legislation that are highly controversial. In section 5, Eximbank's ability to make its programs available to companies in South Africa is terminated; and in section 6, the People's Republic of China is declared eligible for Exim support. The committee was bitterly divided on both of these issues as the House will be, but we want to assure you that this did not in any way affect the committee's support for the continuation of the Eximbank or for the increase in its authority.

Similarly, we expect you to vote your hearts on South Africa and the People's Republic of China; but no matter what the outcome, we hope you will vote in support of the legislation.

Eximbank is one of the most successful operations ever launched by Congress. It is self-supporting and uses no tax dollars. It operates at a substantial profit, year after year. It does not get involved with foreign aid. It helps expand trade—by providing financing for U.S. exports that would otherwise not be sold abroad.

I strongly urge your support for this measure.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. WYLIE).

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I have consistently supported the Eximbank. It has done an outstanding job since its inception in 1935.

The need for an export promotion policy in this country should be clearly evident to anyone who has read about recent trade deficit figures.

The Eximbank is a very effective and efficient operation despite the low profile it continues to maintain. The Eximbank enables U.S. exporters to find financing to ship exports abroad when commercial financing is not available. Many medium- and long-term sources of domestic credit are just not interested in financing foreign trade transactions. There are a number of reasons for this. Commercial lenders perceive a greater risk in financing foreign transactions, and often prefer to lend at home. Banks and other sources of commercial credit are not willing to lend for maturities exceeding 5 to 7 years from the date of commitment.

Yet, despite commercial bank reluctance to increase export finance, the United States has maintained a competitive advantage in the large projects with long maturities which often take as much as 5 years to build. There is clearly a need for supplemental financing for this sort of project, to assist U.S. commercial lenders and borrowers.

One of the most important reasons for maintaining a strong Export-Import Bank is that all our major competitors have similar export credit institutions. In some cases, our foreign competitors are using cut-rate export credit as a trade promotion device. An important provision of Eximbank's charter gives the Bank the authority to meet foreign competition's rates and terms so that the U.S. products can compete on their merit.

This House recognized in 1974, when it last extended Exim's authorization, that competition between export credit facilities was counterproductive. The Congress instructed the Eximbank to begin negotiations with its foreign counterparts to reduce competition in export credit. This year the Eximbank reached partial agreement with the other official export credit agencies on minimum rates and terms to be offered. While it is too early to judge the effectiveness of this agreement, the outlook is promising that competition on export credit can be reduced.

Along this same line, the committee in this bill asks Treasury to begin new, higher level negotiations to end the predatory financing practices used by some of our more aggressive trading partners to win more business. Our competitors should understand that we are deadly serious about this issue and will consider mandating Eximbank to move in the same direction if these practices are not ended.

One other important realization was made during the committee's hearings. The Export-Import Bank has become far less controversial than it was 3 years ago when it was last before us. Three years ago, Congress criticized the Bank for having loaned, at cut rates, below its costs of funds. We wondered what Exim's role was going to be in the new era of floating exchange rates. We had serious problems with Exim support for exports of energy production equipment when that equipment was in short supply here in the United States. In part due to congressional action in 1974 and in part due to the rigorous direction of Exim's former and current chairman, the Eximbank has changed many of its objectional practices and now enjoys wide support from the Congress. The Bank continues to do an effective job of preventing loss of export business for lack of export credit.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. HARKIN).

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to rise in general support of this legislation. However, I do feel that there is one pertinent thing missing, and that is meaningful human rights language in the bill itself. For that reason I will be offering the same type of human rights language that has been offered and passed by this body and signed into law on the various other bilateral and multilateral institutions that we deal with in terms of trade and aid to other countries. I would just say to those who argue that we do not need a human rights type of thing in this kind of bill, I would point out that we already have two human rights amendments that apply to this bill. One has been the Jackson-Vanik amendment that does not allow the Eximbank to supply aid or trade to those countries that prohibit open emigration and, of course, the other human rights amendment is the one that was just adopted in committee dealing with South Africa. I would argue that there are other countries where there are gross and consistent violations of human rights that are every bit as bad as apartheid or the lack of an open emigration policy. For that reason, I feel that a human rights amendment covering the entire bill and applying to all countries is really the way to go. For that reason, I will offer an amendment as an addition to the bill in the last section.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. GRASSLEY).

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the bill. I feel that this legislation will benefit both American workers and consumers by fostering the growth of American exports.

I am pleased that the committee report contains language instructing Eximbank to delineate in their reports to Congress and in their annual report, the impact of Bank activities upon employment in this country. I had introduced this language in committee better to insure that the Bank, and its foreign clients, understand that the overriding purpose of the Bank is to strengthen the American economy, and to foster U.S. employment. With the increased lending authority granted under this act, there is a possibility that the Bank might find itself financing projects which would cut into American jobs. With the accountability fostered by this report language, this possibility should be reduced.

In committee, I had offered another amendment which dealt with the question of foreign countries' treatment of private and public debt, including debt to our Export-Import Bank, in the rescheduling process. I offered this amendment because I had wanted to insure that this country's taxpayers are not short-changed when a foreign nation is forced to renegotiate with its creditors in order to avoid default or serious trouble in its economy. What prompted this amendment was an incident in Zaire in which private creditors, namely the big New York City banks, were paid off on time and in full, while some official creditors were forced to accept longer repayment schedules. In the IMF bill passed earlier this year, there was a similar provision.

In committee, this amendment did not pass, primarily because my colleagues felt that it was inappropriate to include this type of language in the charter itself.

However, during the debate on my amendment, the leadership expressed the opinion that it would be worthwhile to include this language in the Legislative History in order to clarify that it is the intent of Congress that the Bank shall attempt to assure, when appropriate, comparable treatment to official Government creditors, multilateral lending institutions and private creditors with regard to any debt renegotiation.

The Bank agrees that it has been their policy in the past and shall be in the future to work for the benefit of this country's taxpayers when other countries seek a rescheduling of their debt. The Bank is to be commended for this. However, debt rescheduling is a very complex matter, and one that should neither be entered into nor considered lightly. Eximbank's creditors, and the taxpayers, should both be made aware that the Bank will continue to employ such a policy, for it is certainly in our interest, and in the long-range interests of all countries, to insist that such public moneys be carefully allocated and conscientiously spent.

I congratulate the committee leadership for getting out this bill. I know how hard both sides of the aisle have worked to put out a good bill, and I urge that it be adopted.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, at this point I include the U.S. policy on multilateral debt reorganizations:

U.S. POLICY ON MULTILATERAL DEBT REORGANIZATIONS

POLICY

The policy of the U.S. Government on the reorganization of international debts has the following elements.

1. Debt-service payments on international debt should be reorganized on a case-by-case basis only in extraordinary circumstances where reorganization is necessary to ensure repayment. Debt relief should not be given as a form of development assistance.

2. Debt-service payments on loans extended or guaranteed by the U.S. Government will normally only be reorganized in the framework of a multilateral creditor-club agreement.

3. When a reorganization takes place that involves government credits or government-guaranteed credits, the U.S. will participate only if:

(a) the reorganization agreement incorporates the principle of non-discrimination among creditor countries, including those that are not party to the agreement;

(b) the debtor country agrees to make all reasonable efforts to reorganize unguaranteed private credits falling due in the period of the reorganization on terms comparable to those covering government or government-guaranteed credits;

(c) the debtor country agrees to implement an economic program designed to respond to the underlying conditions and to overcome the deficiencies which led to the need for reorganizing debt-service payments.

4. The amounts of principal and interest to be reorganized should be agreed upon only after a thorough analysis of the economic situation and the balance-of-payments prospects of the debtor country.

5. The payments that are reorganized normally should be limited to payments in arrears and payments falling due not more than one year following the reorganizing negotiations.

BACKGROUND

When an individual country defaults or faces imminent default on its debt-service obligations, it may seek debt relief from some or all of its creditors by requesting reorganization of all or part of its debts. Official and officially-guaranteed debt has been reorganized predominately in creditor groups such as the "Paris Club". (Some official debt reorganizations have been negotiated in aid consortia, as in the case of India and Pakistan, but these were the result of unique circumstances.)

The negotiations with creditor groups set the general terms for reorganizing direct government credits, and private credits guaranteed by creditor-country governments on a non-discriminatory basis among countries participating in the negotiations and those that are not (such as communist countries). Subsequently, bilateral arrangements are concluded between the individual creditor countries and the debtor country to implement this multilateral agreement. As a general rule, the international financial and monetary institutions have not reorganized their credits.

Negotiations to reorganize debt-service payments on unguaranteed credits extended by private creditors usually take place separately from the negotiations with official creditors. Occasionally, debt-service payments on these credits are reorganized while payments on government credits and government-guaranteed credits are made on schedule. More commonly, negotiations with private creditors on their unguaranteed credits follow immediately upon the conclusion of negotiations with the government creditors. Comparability can be achieved without actually rescheduling or refinancing debt-service payments, if the private creditors agree to extend additional credit (i.e., greater than the amount which would have been rescheduled or refinanced if they had chosen those methods of debt reorganization) to the debtor country on terms comparable to those negotiated in the creditor club.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. DICKINSON) to speak out of order.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. DICKINSON was allowed to proceed out of order.)

THE LATE SENATOR JAMES B. ALLEN

(Mr. DICKINSON asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, if I might have the attention of the Members, I have a very sad announcement to make I just received a phone call from Mayor Arthur Holk of Foley, Ala., advising me of the death by heart attack of Senator JIM ALLEN of Alabama. This was less than half an hour ago. He has been taken to a funeral home. There have been no arrangements, of course; but it is certainly a tragic loss to me personally, to my State and to the Nation. He was a brave, courageous, outstanding man, and it certainly is sad for me to make this announcement. No man will be able to take his place in the Senate or in importance to this Nation.

I knew that the Members would be interested and would be following subsequent announcements with interest.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. LEACH).

Mr. LEACH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 12157. As a member of the Banking Committee and its International Trade Subcommittee, I have become increasingly convinced that the Eximbank plays a vital role not only in facilitating the sale of U.S. products abroad but also in stimulating American companies to commence or expand export operations. Clearly, if we are to reduce continued trade deficits which are a major source of downward pressure on the dollar, U.S. exports must be substantially increased. The Eximbank is a principal means to achieve this purpose. Therefore, I feel it is imperative that the life of the Eximbank be extended and that the Bank's lending authority be raised as directed by this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, sections 4 and 7 of H.R. 12157 resulted from amendments I offered during committee consideration. Section 4 requires that negotiations be conducted with other major exporting countries to end predatory export financing programs. During hearings I was particularly impressed by a number of instances of predatory financing provided by foreign counterpart institutions of the Eximbank that adversely affected the market abilities of U.S. companies.

For instance, one major American company testified that in competitive bidding for a contract in Malaysia it had been ranked first in price and first in quality yet lost the contract to a Japanese firm when the Japanese Government offered 20-year financing at 4 percent; in another instance, a foreign government authorized a 2-year moratorium on any payment on machinery purchased from one of its manufacturers. In view of this problem, I feel it is imperative that the United States enter into negotiations as directed by section 4 to try to bring an end to these unfair trade practices.

In this regard, it should be clear that the ministerial level negotiations called for in section 4 are in no way designed to conflict with the on-going multilateral trade negotiations in Geneva; nor are they designed to discourage increased efforts to make more effective the agreements already reached between the export financing agencies of a number of the principal trading countries of the world.

Unfortunately, the only alternative to successful international negotiations in this area is for Eximbank to offer softer financing terms, with the likely prospect of operating at a substantial deficit. Clearly, a negotiated end to predatory financing is a preferable alternative. If however, movement is not made in this direction, we may witness the emergence of a kind of international trade warfare that has nothing to do with economic competition but rather with the will of individual governments to establish reverse trade barriers.

Predatory financing arrangements may be the cutting edge of trade warfare in today's international economy. The establishment of unfair trade incentives in 1978 could be as potentially dangerous to the international economy as was the erection of nationalistic import restrictions in 1933.

It should be clear that Congress is concerned about jobs in America and equality of trade opportunity, and that in the absence of international cooperation on this problem, Congressional intent is for the Eximbank to place increasing emphasis on competitive factors in its lending decisions.

Mr. Chairman, section 7 stipulates that the Eximbank emphasize assistance to new and small business entrants in the agricultural export market and that the Bank develop a program of education to increase awareness of export opportunities among small agri-businesses and cooperatives.

The agricultural export industry is one of the most concentrated in this country. Five or six huge commodity companies have virtually a stranglehold on U.S. grain exports. Three of these companies are foreign-owned. Farmers want to broaden their sales options and see locally owned elevators and cooperatives get directly involved in the export of commodities, but often these locally-controlled businesses lack the experience and know-how to begin such an effort. The priority attention mandated for new and small business entrants in the agricultural commodity market and the attendant educational efforts required under this section hopefully will help overcome this obstacle.

Mr. Chairman, I urge adoption of H.R. 12157.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEACH. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent to put into the RECORD immediately following the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. GRASSLEY) the official U.S. policy on multilateral debt reorganizations in response to a request by the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. GRASSLEY).

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from North Carolina will have to get that permission in the House.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I will assure the gentleman we will seek that permission from the House.

Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. KELLY

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KELLY: On page 4, line 13, strike "determination.". and insert the following:

"determination. However, the Bank will not be prohibited from guaranteeing, insuring, or extending credit or participating in any extension of credit to the Republic of South Africa so long as the Bank is guaranteeing, insuring, or extending credit or participating in any extension of credit to any Communist country as defined in Section 620(f) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 as amended and specifically including in addition, the People's Republic of Angola, Democratic Kampuchea (Cambodia) and the People's Republic of Vietnam.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, Members of the House, my amendment says simply that Eximbank participation in loans to U.S. business for projects in South Africa cannot be cut off so long as Exim can participate in loans to U.S. business for projects in any Communist country.

Let me quote to you the purpose of Eximbank as stated in section 2(a)(1):

The objects and purposes of the Bank shall be to aid in financing and to facilitate exports and imports and the exchange of commodities between the U.S. . . . and any foreign country.

and section 2(b)(1)(A):

To foster expansion of exports of goods and related services, thereby contribtuing to the promotion and maintenance of high levels of employment and real income and to the increased development of the productive resources of the United States.

This body is making an effort to turn the Eximbank into a political rather than a commercial institution; and it is totally out of character with the intention of Congress and is clearly not in the best interests of the American people, our constituents, at a time when jobs are needed. It is also not in the best interests of U.S. industry at a time when our foreign exchange position suffers.

The bill H.R. 12157 is so totally hypocritical that it defies description. It provides that South Africa should be precluded from Eximbank transactions while Eximbank carries on business as usual with an array of Communist nations. And, as far as I know, communism is entitled to no accolades in the sphere of human rights and civil liberties.

Communism is the absolute opposite of civil rights, human rights, dignities, and freedom for all people. And yet the United States is in the process of dealing with Poland, Romania, Yugoslavia, and we are on the threshold of entering into trade relations with Hungary—after returning the Crown of St. Stephen.

For this Congress to be in favor of dealing with Communist countries and at the same time opposing any dealings with South Africa defies all logic.

In any event, as politicians, we may weigh and debate forever which of the nations of the world show more compassion for civil liberties. But commerce, not politics, is the purpose of this legislation.

Regardless of what can be said of South Africa's internal policies, I oppose doing business with any Communist country if we are going to preclude Eximbank transactions with any nation on the basis of human rights.

Those who applaud the march of communism across the continent of Africa will not agree. But South Africa is a strategically located and powerful ally of the United States whose loyalty is proven and valued, particularly at a time when Rhodesia is on the brink of war and Communist intervention by Russia and its Cuban allies is imminently threatened.

South Africa is the strongest military power on the Continent. It has at its disposal a crack military contingent of 60,000 and an impressive inventory of military equipment: 161 medium tanks, 1,050 armored cars, 350 armored personnel carriers, 72 surface-to-air missiles, two destroyers, three submarines, six light bombers, and 117 fighter/attack aircraft. These forces are crucial in any potential confrontation with Communist invaders.

The survival of South Africa under a pro-Western government is crucial to Western security. If, by undermining the South African Government and its economy, we push the country under Soviet domination, we will seriously hamper the strategic position of the free world.

For our own security and selfish economic interests, this is no time for penny-ante domestic political posturing.

South Africa is a major supplier of essential and rare raw materials that are necessary for our own prosperity: chrome, industrial diamonds, ferromanganese, platinum, to name just a few. Annual trade between the United States and South Africa reached almost the $2.5 billion level last year.

The Black Nations of Africa are themselves important trading partners of South Africa. Some of the poorest nations, such as Lesotho, Malawi, Mozambique, and Swaziland are unable to employ the majority of their own people and depend on South Africa to absorb the surplus workforce. These poor nations derive approximately 25 percent of their GNP from the income of migrant workers employed in South Africa.

These poor nations face economic ruin if the South African economy shrinks as the result of our disinvestment.

The South Africans have proven to be a determined, strong, industrious, and reliable people. Adding this all together—it sounds as though they are the kind of allies we need.

We can both sympathize with and deplore the racial problems and tensions besetting South Africa today for we ourselves have not gone without this experience.

For our own self-interest, and motivated by common sense, we should honor South Africa for its strength and friendship, and encourage and assist in every constructive way a solution to any deprivation of human rights or equality in that country.

We as Americans have required time to solve our problems that are nowhere near the magnitude of the problems facing the South African nation. South Africa is our ally at a time when we need friends, and we should be no less willing to give them understanding than we were to desire the same for our own Nation.

All of this discussion is timely and it is worthy. But it is inappropriate in the context of the Eximbank legislation and the congressional purpose that created it.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the hour is late and I will try to be sensitive to that. I would point out to the Committee that the amendment which was introduced relative to South Africa passed in the subcommittee by a 10-to-5 vote. It then went to the full committee, and there were several attempts to water it down, all of which failed. An amendment identical to the one introduced by the gentleman from Florida failed by a 38-to-6 margin. I would only point out that it is an attempt to water down what the Committee thought was an important amendment which the Committee supported. I think the fallacy of the amendment is obvious on its face. It is a way of rendering the South Africa amendment void, and without going into greater detail because of the time, I would ask that the amendment be soundly defeated.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment says that the Bank would be prohibited from extending or participating in any extension of credit to any Communist country. The President has determined that we can export and officially support exports to Poland, Romania, Yugoslavia, and Hungary. This amendment would prohibit those exports, and the purpose of this bill is to increase the exports of this country to provide profits and jobs in this country. We are running a trade deficit of some $31 billion this year. This amendment simply would not hurt anyone but our manufacturers and our employees in this country.

I would also like to point out that the amendment specifically excludes Kampuchea and the Peoples Republic of Vietnam, and those countries are already excluded.

There is another amendment that I understand will be offered by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS), which I think is certainly worthy of some consideration, which would modify this, but I certainly would urge my colleagues to defeat this amendment.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TSONGAS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

In regard to the amendment, there were editorials in the Washington Post, the New York Times, and the Boston Globe that speak to the amendment and the kind of issues that would be undermined by this amendment. I will ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to place those editorials in the RECORD at this point. They are as follows:

[From the Washington Post, May 4, 1978]

WIDENING THE ATTACK ON APARTHEID

The new restriction on trade with South Africa now making its way through the legislative process represents a growing force in American politics. No longer is opposition to apartheid merely a minority cause or a campus issue or, as Pretoria often claims, a policy whose support is confined pretty much to the administration figures who plug it, naively or cynically as the case may be. On the contrary, it is coming to represent a genuine popular movement commanding its own congressional base.

So it is that the House Banking Committee, hardly a collection of bleeding hearts, has just approved what would be the first congressional curb on economic ties with South Africa. Drafted by Rep. Paul Tsongas (D.-Mass.), the amendment would prohibit the Export-Import Bank, a government agency that facilitates American trade, from financing exports to South Africa unless the president determines—and the Congress agrees—that Pretoria is making "significant progress toward the elimination of apartheid."

We are not enamored of the idea of economic sanctions against South Africa. They are a blunt weapon, pressing on both whites responsible for repression and whites seeking reform, on blacks who welcome that pressure as a move against apartheid and on blacks who see it as an invitation to harsher racial confrontation and to hardship for blacks as well as whites. There is also the question, raised in the Senate Banking Committee, of why South Africa alone should be singled out for its internal defects. The administration, we note, did not support this amendment. It objects even to well-meaning congressional restrictions on executive flexibility, and it does not wish to encourage political amendments to economic bills.

The political meaning of the Tsongas amendment is nonetheless clear. The American public's consciousness of apartheid is being raised. From the administration, the idea has spread to Congress that American relations with South Africa will inevitably deteriorate further if Pretoria is not seen to be moving with all deliberate speed to alter the nature of a system that virtually all Americans, regardless of their differences on tactics, regard as an abomination and as a temptation to society-wide violence. Many in South Africa seem to feel their country can tough it out: circumvent or survive the Carter administration and find more "understanding" for apartheid elsewhere in the American body politic. The Tsongas amendment says South Africa is wrong.

[From the New York Times, Apr. 25, 1978]

TO STOP SUBSIDIZING REPRESSION

The House Banking Committee votes tomorrow on legislation to end all activities of the Export-Import Bank in South Africa. It should express its approval, and so should the full House. Although the proposed measure is not of great economic significance, it is one more step toward getting the American taxpayer out of the business of subsidizing South Africa's system of racial repression.

The Ex-Im Bank is an independent Federal agency which, through its own loans and guarantees of commercial bank loans, helps foreigners buy American industrial goods. Other governments boost their own exports by providing subsidized loans; and Washington does so to stay competitive. Ex-Im's operations in South Africa are not extensive. It has not made a direct loan to finance exports to South Africa since 1964. Last year it guaranteed or insured $115 million of commercial bank loans, almost all for three years or less. Commercial banks might have made many of the loans without Ex-Im's guarantees, but some export sales, as well as American jobs, might have been lost to European or Japanese competitors.

Curtailing Ex-Im's operations in South Africa is a step the Administration can take under existing legislation, and it has been contemplating taking it. Nevertheless, the Administration objects to being ordered by Congress to take that step, arguing that it is thereby deprived of diplomatic flexibility. There is merit in that argument. But there is greater merit in Congress going on record as willing to take concrete measures to express its abhorrence of Pretoria's racist policies.

Many white South Africans have assumed that Congress would content itself with mere rhetorical gestures, like the resolution of condemnation after the death last fall of Stephen Biko and the mass arrests of Pretoria's opponents. White South Africans have contended, also, that once the Carter Administration has passed from the scene, pressure from the United States will ease. But Congressman Paul Tsongas's amendment to Ex-Im's legislative charter provides that pressure should ease only when the President determines that South Africa has made "significant progress" toward majority rule. Ten of his 15 subcommittee colleagues found his reasoning persuasive when they voted last week. The full Banking Committee should do so now.

[From the Boston Globe, May 15, 1978]

BEYOND RHETORIC ON SOUTH AFRICA

The House will soon vote on legislation that would bar the Export-Import Bank from supporting any US exports to South Africa until that nation makes "significant progress" toward majority rule. The actual impact of such a move would be small, but it should be made to offer a tangible piece of evidence to the government in Pretoria that it cannot simply outlast the Carter Administration and its lofty rhetoric about human rights, that the American people are united in their repulsion at apartheid.

All sorts of objections are almost certain to be raised on the House floor. The move will politicize the bank's operations, it will be said. It is hard to see, however, why denying South Africa loan guarantees is political while advancing them is apolitical. In world affairs, almost any government action has a political significance.

It will be argued that if South Africa is denied Ex-Im supports so too should some 76 other nations with human-rights violations. Maybe, in fact, sanctions ought to be imposed on other countries. They each should be studied one at a time. But an appropriate place to begin surely is with a nation where virulent racism is written into law.

It will be noted that the Carter Administration itself has not backed the bar to Ex-Im activities in South Africa. Yet, the Administration has contemplated just such a move—it could make it now under current law—and, in fact, its purposes might well be best served if the step is initiated by Congress. That way the Administration would be able to argue in future negotiations with Pretoria, that the ban on Ex-Im activities was "imposed" by Congress.

There are other things to be said as well. For instance, direct Ex-Im aid to South Africa has been barred for 14 years and what is proposed now—at the instigation of Rep. Paul Tsongas (D-Mass.)—is simply a tightening of policy to end the $200 million of indirect assistance to the country via Ex-Im guarantees and insurance for loans obtained from private banks by South African purchasers of U.S. goods.

But those are all rather narrow, technical arguments. More important in this case is a matter of principle. It is time for the United States, through its government, to go beyond rhetoric and take a tangible step to express its abhorrence at the official, degrading, inhuman racism of South Africa.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I did hear the calls for a vote across the way, so I am going to be very brief. But naturally the Members would all want to hear my advice before they vote.

I would like to point out that I think the gentleman from Florida (Mr. KELLY) is one of the great legal minds of this Congress, and he towers over most of us in his intellectual prowess, in his determination and his vigor. However, I think this is a slightly imperfect amendment.

I believe the committee made a grave mistake in imposing the restrictions on the extension of credit to the Republic of South Africa, but I have always believed that two wrongs do not make a right. The trouble with this amendment is, first of all, it equates the Government of South Africa with a Communist government, and that is not true at all. Communist governments for the most part deny all of their citizens of almost all their civil and human rights. In the Republic of Africa you have a denial of some of the citizens of some of their civil rights.

The other thing is that while South Africa has become a great target, I find that in many of the countries across Africa—I could mention Burundi, Rwanda, Uganda, Guinea, and Congo Brazzaville—there is persecution by a minority of one tribe against another or one-man rule in classic dictatorships.

There is awful silence here in this Chamber when I mention black dictatorships. Why is it that it is only in the Republic of South Africa where everyone is indignant about the abuse by the minority of the majority. If we wanted to be consistent, we could review 20 or 30 countries across Africa and deny the benefits of this bill or deny foreign aid because of a minority abusing a majority. But it would seem to me that in this case the logical course of action is to proceed as expeditiously as possible to the amendment that will be offered by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS).

This amendment should fall by the wayside. I do not think it helps South Africa to say that we will treat it just as we treat Communist governments.

As a matter of fact, given the specific fragmentations of the Communist world, I think it is in our national interest to have expanded trade and certain agreements with governments, such as Yugoslavia and Rumania. As a result, I would think the logical course of action would be to reject the amendment and then take the hint that I believe was given by the gentleman from Georgia to rally behind the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware, which will restore some balance to this bill as it relates to South Africa.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DERWINSKI. I yield to the very distinguished gentleman from Florida.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding; but the perception that the gentleman attributes to the gentleman from Florida is not always apparent in the general membership. For this reason, this particular amendment was couched in the way it was. I thought everyone would be able to see if you are going to deal in human rights that then certainly you could not deal with any Communist country and then preclude any other country in the world. I thought that the contrast would be sufficiently vivid so that no one would be able to miss the point. I have not been totally successful, I see; but in either event, I stand on the proposition that if we are going to cause this to be a political and human rights document, then let it be; but if we are going to cause it to be a commercial document that is calculated to help our industry and to create jobs and work for our people, then what we should do is do what is in our best interest and certainly not preclude an ally that is needed at this particular time.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I do not quarrel with the countries the gentleman specifically mentions; but I do say that the reason to deny Export-Import credit to Bulgaria and East Germany or the Soviet Union is very different from the reasons that exist when we discuss South Africa. I think we should keep those issues separate. For that reason, I made the point that many other countries in Africa are equally oppressive due to tribal oppression.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. KELLY).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KELLY) there were—ayes 38, noes 66.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote, and pending that, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. For the benefit of the gentleman from Florida, the Chair has just counted and there are 104 Members present. A quorum is present.

RECORDED VOTE

The CHAIRMAN. The pending business is the demand of the gentleman from Florida (Mr. KELLY) for a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 157, noes 190, not voting 87, as follows:

PERMISSION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE ON OVERSIGHT AND INVESTIGATIONS OF COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE TO SIT JUNE 2 DURING 5-MINUTE RULE

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce be permitted to sit on Friday, June 2 during the 5-minute rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GIAIMO). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. SARASIN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. SARASIN. Mr. Speaker, on May 31, 1978, I was absent for part of the legislative session of the House of Representatives. Had I been present, I would have voted in the following fashion:

Rollcall No. 380: Journal. The House approved the Journal of Thursday, May 25, "no," and Rollcall No. 380: H.R. 12598. Foreign Relations Authorization. The House agreed to an amendment that strikes language authorizing the establishment of an Institute for International Human Rights, "no."●

INSURANCE INDUSTRY CRITICIZED FOR RESISTANCE TO SELF-INSURANCE FOR PRODUCT LIABILITY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. WHALEN) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. WHALEN. Mr. Speaker, I am mystified by the insurance industry's continued opposition to changing the Internal Revenue Code to facilitate self-insurance for product or professional liability.

As I have stated many times, I believe it is inequitable for the Federal tax code to give a tax subsidy to those who purchase commercial insurance premiums while those who seek to self-insure for all or part of their liability risk get no tax deduction. More importantly, the IRC is currently understood to prevent many companies who wish to do so from establishing self-insurance reserves.

This is a serious problem in the context of the sharply increased costs for product and professional liability insurance coverage. A number of companies and individuals currently operate without any insurance coverage and would welcome the opportunity to provide themselves with some measure of institutionalized self-insurance. And many more companies would benefit if the tax law were changed so that they could more readily set aside funds to allow them to take commercial policies with high deductibles, thus reducing the cost of their premiums.

Next week will mark the first anniversary of the introduction of H.R. 7711, the Product Liability Insurance Tax Equity Act. That bill, which I sponsored along with six other coauthors, and which now has 68 cosponsors and endorsements from dozens of national trade and professional associations, would give self-insurers equal tax treatment. It would allow the creation of tax-exempt self-insurance reserve trust funds and would permit contributions to such funds to be taken as business deductions. Thus, from the businessman's perspective, purchase of commercial insurance and establishment of self-insurance reserves would be put on an equal tax footing.

Various proposals similar to H.R. 7711 have been introduced by Senator CULVER, by Representatives MIKVA and LAFALCE, and others. This past April the Department of Commerce presented an options paper to the White House, advocating that the administration support reform of the IRC to facilitate self-insurance for product liability. The draft bill prepared by the Commerce Department has been introduced in the House by DAN ROSTENKOWSKI and others.

The official organs of the insurance industry remained silent for almost a year regarding the Product Liability Insurance Tax Equity Act and related measures. They were forced to speak, though, when the Commerce Department sought public comment on its product liability options paper.

In general, the response by the insurance industry has been in opposition to our proposal that firms be allowed to self-insure for all or part of their product liability risk.

I currently am preparing a detailed refutation of the arguments recently advanced by the insurance industry spokesmen. My comments should be ready by next week.

In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to my colleagues' attention the lead editorial in the May 29 issue of Business Insurance magazine. This is a highly respected publication whose readership consists mainly of risk managers and others who are consumers in the commercial insurance marketplace.

This editorial, which I am inserting at the conclusion of my remarks, makes a very effective, if brief, rebuttal of the case made by the insurance industry. I also am inserting another article which appeared on the front page of the same publication. It highlights the key elements or the controversy.

I believe my colleagues will find these pieces of interest. In the near future, I will present a more detailed analysis of this issue for your further information:

TAX BREAKS FOR RESERVES CAN ONLY HELP EMPLOYERS DESERVE PENSION INCENTIVES

Unbeknown to many risk managers, the insurance industry is quietly pouring loads of money into a massive lobbying effort to thwart a proposal which would give corporations tax breaks for self-insurance reserves.

The need for such a measure became patently clear as the product liability problems of this country have come into focus in recent months. Corporate America was faced with product liability risks of a magnitude that caused insurance companies to begin charging high prices for their policies covering these losses. Thus, commercial insurance buyers reported facing another very real problem: not being able to afford to buy product liability insurance.

Yet, recognizing that there was no other feasible way for them to prepare ahead of time for these losses, by pre-funding them using tax-free dollars, buyers of insurance got behind a legislative plan that would help solve the insurance affordability problems. The proposed law would enable companies to build internal product liability loss reserves, while taking tax deductions for the funds they set aside for this purpose.

At the same time, the insurance industry has been equally vocal about the "product liability crisis" and the need for tort reform limiting corporate liability for product injuries.

Though it appeared insurance buyers and underwriters were on the same side of the fence on this issue, at second glance it becomes evident this is far from true.

The insurance industry, recognizing it stands to lose what amounts to a lucrative market should their customers suddenly find it advantageous to build internal self-insurance reserves for product liability losses, has swung its massive bulk behind the opposition to the bill.

Risk managers, if they are to convince Congress that there is indeed a product liability problem, must move now to counteract the insurers' lobbying. Tax breaks are necessary for companies which want to build self-insurance reserves against liability losses and which are willing to get the actuarial certification that these reserves are reasonable and warranted. This annual actuarial or independent assessment of reserving practices would go a long way toward preventing abuses of such a tax loophole, a major reason why the insurance industry says it is opposing the bill.

Why is the industry so concerned that small businesses won't be able to adequately fund their self-insurance reserves, leaving some injured person uncompensated or under-compensated for an injury? Though the industry steadfastly maintains there's plenty of product liability insurance available—albeit at a steep price—there's evidence a growing number of businesses are going without any coverage at all, because they either can't afford the premiums or don't think the insurance offers enough value for the price. Since there's not now and not likely to be any legislation requiring companies to buy product liability insurance, it seems much more important at this juncture to assure that companies without insurance have an incentive to fund their future liabilities another way, lest they be unable to compensate injured parties for damage done.

There's another glaring inconsistency here. Insurers have maintained for years that there's inadequate financial capacity for them to underwrite all of the liability coverage being demanded. Now to have them turn around and oppose a measure which would actually help to alleviate this capacity shortage—if there is one, and we think there is—leaves us baffled. Do we or do we not want to encourage companies to pay their own losses at the lower levels, to free up underwriting capacity for catastrophic coverage?

INSURERS FIGHT TAX BREAKS FOR SELF-INSURED RESERVES

(By Jerry Geisel)

WASHINGTON.—Insurance trade associations have denounced legislative proposals that would permit tax deductions for self-insurance funds that businesses set aside in a special reserve to pay product liability claims.

In letters filed with the Commerce Department last month, the Alliance of American Insurers, the American Insurance Assn. and the National Assn. of Independent Insurers charged that the proposals could lead to tax abuse and blunt the drive toward the real solution to product liability—tort reform.

The impact of the opposition cannot be measured. The Treasury Department, which is expected to develop the Administration's position on the tax-deduction concept, still has an "open mind" on the idea, according to Donald Lubick, acting assistant secretary of the Treasury for tax policy.

The insurance trade associations appear very concerned that tax deductions for product liability reserves would lead to abuses, but observers believe the industry is really more concerned about losing more business to self-insurance.

"I just think the insurance industry doesn't want the competition. They really don't like the idea of anybody getting into the insurance business other than insurance companies," said Rep. John LaFalce (D-N.Y.).

The Alliance of American Insurers, in a position paper prepared by vp Don Jordan, contended "the self-insured reserve trust for product liability would be subject to substantial tax abuse."

In order to prevent possible abuses, the Treasury Department would be "saddled with the responsibility of developing complex and lengthy regulations . . . such complexity runs counter to the Administration's pledge to simplify the tax code . . ." Mr. Jordan added.

But Mr. Lubick of the Treasury Department said tax abuse is not an issue. It's "a charge someone makes at a tax provision he doesn't like," he said.

The insurance industry's concern about tax abuse is only "an excuse," said Edith Lichota, assistant treasurer of the Carborundum Corp. in Niagara Falls, N.Y.

"They are trying to preserve the capacity for future insurance industry application when they want it," Mrs. Lichota said. She accused insurance companies of wanting to preserve their markets for first-dollar liability coverage, by making sure the customers are still available to them if insurers change their minds about providing that coverage in the future.

The American Insurance Assn. (AIA) maintains that corporate tax deductions for product liability reserves would not assist those it is designed to help—small businesses.

"If a firm cannot afford to pay increasing product liability premiums, it cannot afford to properly fund its self-insurance fund," said AIA counsel Dennis R. Connolly.

But that assumption is based on the fact that the premium charged is reasonable, said Rep. LaFalce. In view of the "panic pricing" of recent years due to insurers' faulty perception of product liability problems, such an assumption is "highly debatable," Rep. LaFalce added.

The Independent Insurance Agents of America (IIAA), which has not yet taken an official position on tax deductions for self-insurance reserves, cautioned that small businesses do not have the expertise or the money to engage in effective loss prevention programs—a service that is included in an insurance policy.

However, Robert Goshay, executive director of Marsh & McLennan's Product Liability Council, observed that firms self-insuring their product liability risks can purchase loss prevention and claims handling services from a variety of sources including brokers, consultants and even from insurance company subsidiaries (such as Kemper's NATLSCO and INA's ESIS).

CALLED NONINSURANCE

Susan Orsher, counsel for the IIAA, also argued that businesses utilizing product liability self-insurance reserves as the only form of insurance would, in fact, have a program of no insurance (since the amount of reserves would be limited).

"One product liability claim could easily wipe out the reserve, thus leaving the company and possibly the injured party uncompensated or under-compensated," Ms. Orsher added.

But Mr. Goshay of Marsh & McLennan said none of the proposals would prevent companies from purchasing excess policies to meet the infrequent, very high settlement. Furthermore, employers already pay many of their own product liability claims under the high deductibles attached to their policies, he added.

Mr. Connolly of the AIA said the tax deduction proposal was offered as a response to the alleged unavailability of product liability insurance. "There is every indication that product liability insurance is both available and affordable," he said. He denies that any corporations are in a position of having to go bare.

CHIDES INSURERS

But Paul Kipp, insurance manger of U.S. Gypsum Co. and Risk & Insurance Management Society president, said: "I am not aware of any evidence that the marketplace has changed at all other than property/casualty lines are starting to make money.

"I don't know what evidence Mr. Connolly has, but I certainly would like to see it," Mr. Kipp said.

The evidence that does exist indicates that as insurance companies raise product liability premiums, they are insisting on higher and higher retentions, Mrs. Lichota said.

So businesses increasingly are being forced to go bare on first dollar coverage for losses as high as $500,000. As a result employers already are saddled with claims their policies don't cover.

"Isn't it in the public interest to allow companies that have to go bare to set aside something in a reserve to pay for claims rather than have no financial commitment whatsoever from the firm?" asked Mr. Kipp.●

CURRENT BEEF PRICES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. GRASSLEY) is recognized for 15 minutes.

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. Speaker, a couple of days ago the Department of Agriculture announced a revision in the estimate of the increase in retail food prices for this year to 8 to 10 percent. In the last few days there has been a lot of publicity regarding the increase in beef prices at the retail and farm levels. A lead article in today's edition of the Washington Post reads "Consumer Prices Jump 0.9 Percent: Beef Leads Way." I am concerned about how the American public views this publicity and want to make sure that the facts are not distorted with livestock farmers being blamed for the current situation.

I would like to take this opportunity to make a few points. Red meats and poultry accounted for about 15 percent of the retail weight equivalent of food consumed in the United States during the past 5 years. However, since meat costs more per pound than most other foods, consumer expenditures for red meats and poultry account for about one-third of total food expenditures. Beef accounts for a major part of both the weight of meat consumed and the expenditures for meat. I fear that some people might incorrectly assume that beef producers are "striking it rich," because of the current level of beef prices.

Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday of this week the Department of Agriculture made available a publication entitled "Retail Meat Prices in Perspective," written by Dr. James Nix. This analysis brought out several points which I would like to emphasize for my colleagues.

Dr. Nix appropriately points out that livestock producers have no control over livestock prices in the short run, because once livestock have reached slaughter weights they must market them. There only control is to vary the level of supply, which is a lengthy process, particularly for beef. Following is an excerpt from the publication which explains what has happened to cattle feeders since 1974. Also included is the table 4 mentioned in the text which shows the costs and net margins for a Corn Belt cattle feeding operation for the period 1972 through the first quarter of 1978.

The sharply higher corn prices also raised cattle feeding costs. Except for a few brief periods since 1974, cattle feeders generally operated in the red until just the last few months. But for feed cattle marketed over the past 2 or 3 months, profits have been large, because feeder cattle were purchased last fall at prices considerably below current levels.

Large negative returns have characterized cattle feeding operations during the past few years. Based on cost and return estimates for a Corn Belt cattle feeding operation, returns were negative for cattle marketed in 15 of the last 23 quarters. Monthly estimates show that returns are improving and will probably be good for cattle marketed into this summer. But with feeder cattle prices rising, cattle feeder profits may be squeezed by year end.

In 1974, with a weak demand for cattle to go into feedlots and with a continued build-up in the supply of feeder cattle, prices for feeder cattle dropped sharply. They remained at low levels through 1977. These low feeder cattle prices compounded producer losses, and after 4 years of losses many were in severe financial trouble. Many dropped out of business during this period.

This extended period of losses resulted in the massive liquidation of the cattle herd since 1975. Liquidation has continued into 1978 despite the sharp runup in cattle prices since the first of the year. Cattle producers need more than a few months of favorable prices just to regain the losses of the past few years. An extended period of higher prices will be required to get them to step up beef production sharply.

In 1976, estimated nonland costs of producing feeder cattle in the Great Plains region totaled $55.67 per hundredweight. Total nonland cash costs were $25.74. During the past 4 years, feeder cattle prices have generally exceeded the total nonland cash costs, but they have not come close to the total nonland cash and other costs until this year.

From this reduced cattle inventory will come less beef. Furthermore, as herd rebuilding gets underway, beef production will be further reduced by the holding of heifers to expand the herd rather than sending them to slaughter, as cattlemen did for the past several years.

We are hearing rumors that the President is considering suspending import quotas under the 1964 meat import law. I am very concerned about the prospects of such. Allowing more imports into this country will surely have an adverse impact on livestock producers. I also think that suspending the import quotas is not in the best interest of the consumer in the long run.

As shown on the previously mentioned table, Corn Belt cattle feeding operations have had negative returns for cattle marketed in 15 of the last 23 quarters. Producers must be able to cover their costs in the long run. In addition, one must remember the role higher prices play in our market system, which is to give a market signal for producers to halt the liquidation of their herds. Thusly, to the extent that additional imports would have a negative impact on domestic prices, producers would be receiving false market signals. The results would be that farmers would not adequately halt the liquidation of their herds. Consequently, in the long run prices may remain higher or we would have to continue to depend on a higher level of imports or a combination of the two.

I have written President Carter today asking that he give careful consideration before suspending import quotas. I hope he will remember the situation cattle farmers have been facing the last few years.

One additional point I would like to make. Anyone who eats meat is affected by the rise in prices. My family and I enjoy the traditional steak and potato dinner, and I am very aware of price increases. However, I am also a farmer and have been on the other side of the fence where I had cattle to sell. The publication regarding the retail meat prices also discussed the deflated beef prices in 1967 dollars. For the first quarter of 1978 the deflated beef price for choice beef was 80.35 cents per pound. This was lower than it had been in the last 7 years, except for 1977 and the last part of 1976 in real dollar terms. So we as consumers must remember that in real terms beef is no more expensive than it was in 1971 and lower than it was in 1973. THE PRESIDENT SHOULD RECESS THE STRATEGIC ARMS LIMITATION TALKS IN ORDER TO GIVE CONGRESS AN OPPORTUNITY TO REFORMULATE OUR NATIONAL SECURITY GOALS AND NEGOTIATING POSTURE FOR SALT II

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP) is recognized for 30 minutes.

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from several days in Geneva, Switzerland, as a member of the U.S. congressional delegation to the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks—SALT—a post to which I was appointed by you. As additional measures of my interest in, and commitment to, effective arms control, I am concurrently serving as a congressional delegate to the conference of the Committee on Disarmament in Geneva and the United Nations special session on disarmament in New York City, also by your appointment.

As my colleagues know, I have maintained considerable interest in the content of the negotiations for a SALT II treaty as a component of my work as a member of the House Subcommittee on Defense Appropriations. Although I have expressed my concerns on various occasions over the details of some of the tentative agreements arrived at for incorporation in a SALT II treaty, I participated in the Geneva talks without preconceived conclusions. In the course of the Geneva visit, I met with members and staff of the American-Soviet SALT delegations and reviewed the joint draft text of the proposed SALT II treaty and protocol in detail.

I deeply regret that after having an opportunity to observe and study firsthand the character and text of the current proposals advanced by the United States in this, the final round of negotiations, and to meet with SALT negotiators directly, I cannot, in good conscience, recommend that the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks continue in their present form.

THE PRESIDENT SHOULD RECESS THE SALT TALKS

I believe the President should recess the talks, bring home our negotiators, and the SALT process and the joint draft text should be thoroughly reviewed by the Executive and Congress with the intent of reformulating the American negotiating posture in a manner which would allow an agreement to be reached which would be more equitable, totally verifiable, conducive to crisis stability, and unambiguous in its terms.

I have come to this conclusion reluctantly, because I believe that properly conceived arms control measures can enhance our security. I believe a majority of the American people earnestly desire arms control. Effectively limiting the arms race, then beginning a systematic and balanced reduction in strategic arms possessed by both sides, is a prerequisite to devoting greater shares of our national resources to meeting domestic human needs. But arms control does not necessarily equate with arms reduction; they are not always the same. We can have arms control agreements which even permit mutual expansion of strategic arms systems. Many people feel, for example, that the significant Soviet arms buildup following the signing of SALT I in 1972 was because the terms of that treaty permitted it in terms of ceilings and quality of weapons. While this must be avoided at all costs in SALT II, many provisions in the joint draft text would clearly allow the arms race to continue.

Although the SALT process is complicated with extensive detail, the most important elements of the proposed agreement are fully understandable by the American people. In my view, the SALT policy of this administration has taken the negotiations down a fundamentally dangerous path, and can only compromise America's security and undermine the confidence of the American people and the free world in meaningful arms control.

WHY THE TALKS SHOULD BE RECESSED

Let me state briefly why I find these talks so unsatisfactory as to justify their recess and a reformulation of the American negotiating position. For any arms control agreement to work, it must provide equal security and diminish the threat of nuclear war. To do that, it must have three essential properties: Symmetry—the provisions applying equally to both sides; verifiability; and clarity of terms and intent. The SALT II treaty draft fails when measured against these tests. I offer the following examples:

TERMS ARE FUNDAMENTALLY UNEQUAL

The terms of the proposed agreement are fundamentally unequal. The Soviet Union will be permitted within the terms of the agreement to deploy and operate systems which are denied to the United States. For example, the United States is prohibited from deploying "heavy" ICBM's, while the Soviets are permitted to deploy 326 SS–18's each with the ability to deliver five times the payload of our most modern ICBM, the Minuteman III. Similarly, the Soviet bomber known as the Backfire with the unquestioned intercontinental capability, by inflight refueling and landing at Cuban bases, will not be counted against their ceiling on strategic delivery vehicles, while U.S. intercontinental heavy bombers will be counted against the U.S. ceiling.

INEQUALITIES INCREASE THE CHANCES OF NUCLEAR WAR

The one-sided character of the agreement we have proposed may very well increase the risk of nuclear war by making the strategic nuclear environment unstable; that is, the Soviet Union may perceive an incentive to strike first in an intense crisis—such as "a 1980's" version of the Cuban missile crisis—a circumstance we have never had to face since the dawn of the nuclear era. Short of war itself, the mere perception of such circumstances may contribute to a dangerous increase in Soviet boldness and adventurism in the international arena.

VERIFICATION CANNOT BE ASSURED

The proposed agreement is filled with terms where Soviet compliance cannot be verified with high confidence by national technical means of verification. The casual attitude taken by key U.S. SALT policymakers toward verification expressed in the terms of the proposed agreement; namely, that we ought not to insist that the Soviets comply with the letter of the agreement if its violation is not "militarily significant," is simply unacceptable for any American President to be asked to support, and any Congress to ratify.

The recently proposed unverifiable 5-year prohibition on underground nuclear tests by the President confirms the preference of the Carter administration for taking "verification risks" with potentially grave implications for American security in an effort to reach a speedy agreement before the November elections. Based upon the Soviet efforts to evade compliance with the terms of SALT I, we cannot risk entering an agreement unless Soviet compliance with its terms can be fully verified.

THERE SHOULD BE NO SALT AT THE RISK OF COMPROMISING NATO

Fourth. The terms of the proposed SALT II simultaneously has the effect of permitting the increase of the nuclear threat posed to our allies in Europe and Asia, and denies them the means to redress that threat, particularly in the case of long-range, that is, greater than 600 kilometers—ground-launched cruise missiles. Such an agreement, if ratified, would encourage the worst fears in Europe of a Soviet-American domination of European affairs raised in the 1960's, thereby eroding the confidence of our allies in American intentions.

THE RECORD IS CLEAR AS TO WHICH SIDE IS MOST ACTIVELY PURSUING TRUE ARMS CONTROL

While I was in Geneva, Mr. Speaker, the Washington Post editorialized on the Soviet arms buildup and how that buildup contrasted against efforts by the United States to seek genuine arms control. That point is well made.

Since 1959, the United States has signed or ratified concluded 14 bilateral and multilateral arms control agreements, starting with the Antarctic Treaty of 1959 and concluding with the Interim Agreement of 1972. These are in addition to the arms control agreements now being negotiated.

But the real proof of what the U.S. commitment to arms control is—and what the Soviet's commitment to arms control is—lies in what each country has done since SALT I was concluded on May 26, 1972, 6 years ago last week. If actions speak louder than words—and they do—then what has happened over the past 6 years gives us the frame of reference we must use in negotiating SALT II. It also tells us that those negotiations must proceed from stark realities and absolute "What has the United States done during this 6-year period":

We have cancelled the production of the B-1 bomber.

We have slowed the development of a mobile missile system.

We have halted production of the Minuteman III ICBM.

We have slowed production of the Trident submarine.

We have decided to delay production of the neutron bomb.

We have dismantled our only ABM system.

We have terminated production of the Poseidon missile.

In summary, we have slowed down the production of several vital weapon systems, and we have not deployed or completed a single major new strategic defensive or offensive weapons system.

What has the Soviet Union done during this 6-year period? Have they shown restraint? Let us see.

In this 6-year period, the Soviets have:

Deployed four new intercontinental ballistic missiles—the SS–16, the SS–17, the SS–18, and the SS–19.

Deployed a new submarine-launched ballistic missile—the SS–N–8.

Developed an intermediate range ballistic missile, the SS–20, a road-mobile, MIRV'd missile capable of conversion to an ICBM.

Deployed a new class of missile-carrying submarines.

Deployed the Backfire bomber, which with in-flight refueling and landing ability at Cuban bases, is truly a strategic bomber.

That is quite a record.

And has this attempt at limiting the arms race brought about one of its real objectives—moving precious national resources from arms production to domestic human needs? In the United States, it has. In 1954, we were spending 12.7 percent of our gross national product on defense, a figure which declined to 5.2 percent in 1978 and will decline to 4.8 percent in the 1980 budget. That translates as a reduction in percentages of the Federal Government's budget from 65.3 percent for defense in 1954 to 23.5 percent in this calendar year. What has the Soviet record been? While they were spending 8 percent of their gross national product on defense in 1958, today they are spending about 17 percent, more than double.

These facts and statistics speak for themselves as to which country is most interested in, most committed to, limiting the arms race.

WHAT MUST BE DONE

I urge that the negotiations be recessed so that a top-to-bottom review can be made by the Congress, not only of the terms of the SALT II agreement, but also of the entire technical and bureaucratic process which has allowed such a state of affairs to come to pass. The posture we have adopted in SALT would institutionalize the present incipient inferiority of American arms, and codify a long-term and perhaps permanent Soviet military advantage.

The enormity of such an event makes the recessing of the talks a modest proposal that would contribute far more to American security and international peace than the conclusion of Salt II as matters now stand.●

GREEN DISCUSSES VOTE ON TUITION TAX CREDITS FOR ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlemen from New York, Mr. GREEN is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, today I was among those who voted in favor of the Vanik amendment to H.R. 12050, the Tuition Tax Credit Act. The amendment would extend the tuition tax credits in the bill to cover tuition at nonpublic elementary and secondary schools.

In addition, on May 4, I voted for the Luken amendment to the fiscal year 1979 budget resolution which reduced the revenue target in the resolution to accommodate tuition tax credits for elementary, secondary, and college education expenses. The passage of the Luken amendment set the stage for today's vote on the Vanik amendment.

A decade ago, when I was a New York State assemblyman, I opposed tuition tax credits for nonpublic elementary and secondary education. After much thought and study of the circumstances before us in 1978, I have re-evaluated my position and decided to support the Vanik amendment. I have done so for three principal reasons.

First, the Vanik amendment would provide much needed financial relief to lower and middle income families who wish to send their children to nonpublic schools. Across the Nation, 51.4 percent of the families who sent their children to nonpublic elementary and secondary schools have incomes below $15,000 annually. More than 71 percent of these families have incomes below $25,000 per year.

Michael Novak, in a column in the Washington Star of October 23, 1977, summarized the situation most succinctly:

> Consider students in the parochial schools of New York, Chicago, St. Louis and other urban centers these days, most of whom come from families with incomes under $15,000, a third or half of them Black or Hispanic. One reason poor parents pay for such schools is that, on the average, reading scores and other tests are a full grade-level higher than in the public schools. These parents are as hard-working and upwardly striving as any of the poor in American history. To give them a hand will be of enormous assistance.

I want to add to Mr. Novak's comments that in Manhattan, 75.5 percent of the children presently enrolled in parish elementary schools are either black, Hispanic, or Asiatic. In Manhattan's secondary archdiocesan schools, these same minority groups comprise 41 percent of total enrollment.

It is also interesting to note that across Manhattan, 13 percent of the students attending parochial elementary schools are non-Catholic. Certain schools are 50 to 60 percent non-Catholic in enrollment. Indeed, one school in Chinatown is 74 percent non-Catholic.

The thrust of the Novak column forcefully reiterated by Victor Solomon, director of educational affairs for the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), in his testimony on tuition tax credits before the House Ways and Means Committee:

> The rich and the upper middle class in America have always been able to vote with their feet, so to speak, on education. If they do not like the public schools, they send their children to private schools. It is time to give poor and minorities the chance to vote with their feet, the chance to use private education, and tuition tax credits will help. The basic point is this: Blacks and poor people, the most victimized segment of our society, cannot afford to subsidize public schools with their taxes and still pay tuition for private schools.

Tuition tax credits for families who choose to send their children to nonpublic elementary and secondary institutions are not more tax breaks for the wealthy. They also are not back door subsidies to church-sponsored educational facilities. Rather, they are a means through which struggling lower and middle income citizens can be supported in their efforts to acquire the necessary financial resources to send their children to the schools of their choice. As Rabbi Moshe Sherer, executive president of Agudath Israel of America, admonished the Senate Finance Committee: "Pocketbook coercion which denies parents the freedom of choice in education to which they are entitled is an evil."

The use of a tax credit is an appropriate and uncomplicated method of ending that pocketbook coercion. While some have asserted that the revenue loss will be too high or that the tuition tax credit device involves unwise tampering with the Internal Revenue Code, I share the viewpoint expressed editorially in the March 18 edition of America magazine:

> Inconceivably massive sums are currently spent by the nation on everything from intercontinental ballistic missiles to cigarettes. In these circumstances, it does not appear extreme to use the device of tax credits in order to equalize educational opportunities for those families, especially in the middle and lower classes, that prefer non-public schools.

The second reason that I supported the Vanik amendment is that it would help to maintain diversity with respect to elementary and secondary education in the United States. There are those who contend that tuition tax credits would be a "death blow" to public elementary and secondary education in this country. They believe that tuition tax credits would encourage parents to withdraw their children from public schools and send them to competing nonpublic institutions.

I think that underlying that belief is the fear that the enactment of tuition tax credits at the elementary and secondary level would signal a lessening of Federal commitment to preserve the viability of the public school system. If I had thought that this might happen, I certainly would not have voted for tuition tax credits for those educational levels.

I would like to take a moment here to re-emphasize my commitment to a strong and sound system of public education in the United States. There is no question that our public schools need additional support and assistance at the Federal, State, and local levels of government. Public schools service the greatest number of our young people. In addition, with relatively limited financial resources, they must meet the educational needs of handicapped students, those with learning disabilities, and those having discipline and other problems.

In this century, it is clear that public education has enabled millions of individuals from modest or impoverished backgrounds to find personal fulfillment and to enjoy the benefits of the American way of life. I do not think there is anyone who would want to jeopardize the success of the public school system.

However, it is not the public school system that is endangered today. Rather, it is nonpublic education that is threatened by rising costs and competition.

In 1966, 87 percent of all elementary and secondary school students in the United States were enrolled in public schools. Ten years later, that number has grown to 90.2 percent.

In contrast, the U.S. National Center for Education Statistics predicts a drop of enrollment at nonpublic elementary and secondary schools from 6.3 million in 1965 to 4.2 million in 1984.

While nonpublic schools continue to lose students, they also are spending considerably less than public schools on the students who remain. In fiscal year 1966, the per pupil expenditures in New York City public schools was $903. By fiscal year 1975, the per pupil expenditure had jumped to $2,351. The fiscal year 1977 figure was $2,607 per pupil. This must be contrasted with the $500 per pupil presently being spent in archdiocesan schools in New York City. It is important to keep in mind that this is less than one fifth of what the public schools spend, and it is $403 per pupil below what New York City public schools were spending in fiscal year 1966.

We are faced today with nonpublic schools that are struggling to meet rising expenses and to keep up enrollments. Public schools also are in need of assistance, but their survival is not being threatened in the same fashion.

Nonpublic schools must depend upon the financial support and sacrifices of their students' families. These familes have been willing to bear these expenses because they want the kind of education for their children that these institutions provide.

Yet the children and parents who choose nonpublic education are not the only beneficiaries of the quality these schools offer. Our public school system also benefits from the healthy competition and challenge of nonpublic institutions. Victor Solomon of CORE emphasized this in his testimony before the House Ways and Means Committee on the tuition tax credit issue:

> Let me use New York City as an example. The capacities of our young people are being stifled. In the past 2 years, the percentage of children reading at grade level in New York City schools has dropped from 47 percent to 40 percent, and this statistic does not even reflect the worst of the pattern of failure, which occurs in areas such as Harlem and Bedford-Stuyvesant.
> While in CORE's community school in the Bronx—which was formed in response to demonstrated need in that community—children are reading at approximately grade level, children in the neighboring public schools are 1 to 2 years behind. . . . We take the same types of children as the public schools and we teach them. We challenge the public schools to start working again properly. Schools must provide not only knowledge in the basic skills, but must have proper safety and discipline, which many public schools now lack.

The challenge and diversity in education offered by nonpublic schools are a national asset. They make an important contribution to the country's educational vitality and to the development of our young people. When they suffer, truly our entire system of education suffers as well. The importance of nonpublic education was eloquently underscored in the following letter I received from an interfaith group of religious leaders in the 18th Congressional District which I represent:

> EAST COAST SYNOD, ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCHES,
> New York, N.Y., May 4, 1978.
> Hon. WILLIAM GREEN,
> House of Representatives,
> Washington, D.C.
> DEAR CONGRESSMAN GREEN: Education in America has traditionally been diverse. Public and non-public institutions work side by side in our pluralistic society. The public schools come first. The first claim and by far the largest claim on public resources is theirs. And these claims have in fact been attended to first.
> But taxpaying parents who choose nonpublic schools have claims too.
>
> In the past two decades, our federal government has begun to take educational needs as well as other local needs more seriously. This is evidenced by the billions of federal dollars now devoted to education and by landmark legislation passed by the Congress.
> This federal aid is flowing not at all in most areas to the non-public schools and in minute amounts in other areas, amounts insufficient to enable them to bear today's financial strains.
>
> Our society through government funding is increasingly expanding the opportunities of individuals and private groups to do their own thing in poverty programs, neighborhood preservation, the theatre, the dance, and the arts generally. Even to keeping the Rockettes going at the Radio City Music Hall. Why not in education?
> We are firmly persuaded that the tax dollars which help support persons and institutions carrying out such a variety of non-governmental cultural activities should also help support taxpaying parents in their choice of schools for their children. These non-governmental schools combine the best in education with a strong current of familial and other cultural values.
>
> These non-governmental schools are efficient and economical.
>
> The tuition tax credit bills now in Congress constitute a mechanism to help families who use such schools while providing a transfusion of federal resources to the local scene, an effect much desired by our financially beleaguered city and state.
> All the western democracies, save ours up to this time, have developed ways of aiding non governmental education while retaining the principle of separation of church and state. The proposed leigslation is constitutionally sound. No wall of separation between church and state is breached.
> Rabbi Morris Sherer, an orthodox Jewish educator, has said: "This is not a Catholic issue, nor for that matter a Jewish issue, nor a Lutheran issue. The public now senses that it is an American issue, and that at stake is the basic principle of freedom of choice in education."
>
> We therefore urge you to vote for specific legislation providing tax credits to parents of elementary and secondary schools. This will help insure freedom of choice by parents, continued diversity in education, and a fair share of the education tax dollar for all taxpayers.
>
> Will you kindly let us know your views? Thank you.
>
> Sincerely,
> RUDOLPH R. F. RESSMEYER, DD,
> President/Bishop.

Mr. Speaker, I believe tuition tax credits for elementary and secondary education will help to maintain the diversity these noted clergymen cited in their letter and give parents the financial relief necessary to exercise their freedom of choice.

The third major reason that I supported the Vanik amendment is that tuition tax credits would provide families with educational options in our urban centers so that they would not have to move out of our cities and to the suburbs to find additional educational opportunities for their children. There are many parents in our major urban areas who are not satisfied with the public school systems in these cities. While there certainly are many reasons that people move from urban centers to the suburbs, the relative attractiveness of the suburban public school facilities is an important inducement in this regard.

It was recently brought to my attention that about 70,000 students have been withdrawn from New York City public schools over the past 2 years. It is evident that these students are not transferring to parochial schools, since the Archdiocese of New York is having to close schools.

Although it is hard to pinpoint with certainty the reasons for such a decline in enrollment, it is safe to assume that a significant number of those leaving the New York City public schools have been withdrawn by families moving out of the city. This is a problem that urban areas across the country are experiencing.

I believe that the availability of tuition tax credits for nonpublic education might help to keep some of these families in our major cities. They would make it financially possible for these parents to send their children to alternative schools in the cities. Public policy should encourage these families to remain in our urban centers.

In closing, I would like to take a moment to address the question of the constitutionality of tuition tax credits for elementary and secondary education. In a number of decisions since 1947, the Supreme Court has upheld the constitutionality of reimbursement of fares paid for public transportation to church-related schools, tax exemptions for church property, and loans by States of secular textbooks to students in church-related schools.

In Committee for Public Education v. Nyquist, 413 U.S. 756 (1973), the Court invalidated a New York tuition reimbursement and tax relief plan. The plan provided limited tuition reimbursements to low-income families with children attending nonpublic elementary and secondary schools. Families failing to qualify for tuition reimbursement were allowed tuition tax credits in varying amounts depending upon adjusted gross income.

It was clear that the funds involved in the New York plan would largely reimburse only sectarian school tuitions. In contrast, the Vanik amendment, with a varied national impact, would provide assistance for tuitions at many nonsectarian institutions. The Vanik amendment would confer benefits spread over the entire population and would not serve to perpetuate any particular school system. Moreover, it should be noted that Nyquist itself suggests that incidental aid to those attending sectarian schools "in connection with a more broadly based program" may occupy a different constitutional status (413 U.S. at 794).

These, then, are the principal reasons that I voted in favor of the Vanik amendment. Tuition tax credits for elementary and secondary education would not hurt our public school system, but would help to insure the viability of nonpublic institutions. In addition, they would enable parents to truly exercise educational freedom of choice and encourage urban families to remain in our cities. They would foster educational diversity, and American education as a whole would benefit from the contributions of such a pluralistic system.

THE 32D ANNIVERSARY OF THE ITALIAN REPUBLIC

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to bring to the attention of my colleagues the anniversary of the Republic of Italy which is observed on June 2.

It was 32 years ago on this day that the Italian people voted in a plebiscite to end their constitutional monarchy and establish a republic. By replacing the Italian monarchy with a republican form of government, Italy began her return to the cultural and political prominence she had long enjoyed.

Aldo Moro, the former Premier who was recently kidnapped and murdered by renegades, was one of the founding fathers of the Republic of Italy. He wove his commitment to justice and democracy deeply into the fabric of the Republic. His steadfast devotion to a democratic Italy during his lifetime is now serving as a beacon light of guidance and hope to Italy, as the Italian people work together to strengthen their democracy in the wake of this tragedy.

Aldo Moro's career directly paralleled the growth of the Italian Republic. He gave more than three decades of dedicated public service, during which time he served as president of the National Council of the Christian Democratic Party, five times as Prime Minister, and several times as Minister of Foreign Affairs. He had also served in the Chamber of Deputies since 1948, and prior to his untimely and tragic death, was expected to become President of Italy at the end of this year.

The calamitous loss of Aldo Moro has brought about a renewed sense of Italy's importance as friend and ally of the United States and has strengthened the resolve of the Italian people and their leaders to reinforce the ties that bind the Western Alliance in which Aldo Moro so strongly believed.

The 32d anniversary of the Italian Republic is an appropriate occasion not only to recall Aldo Moro's lifetime of service to his nation and his dedication to the principles of democracy on which the Republic was founded, but also to look ahead, as the Italian people, with renewed strength and courage, surmount this misfortune.

I take this opportunity to extend my greetings and best wishes to the people of the Italian Republic, as well as to the Italian Americans in my own 11th Congressional District of Illinois and throughout our country, who are joining in this 32d anniversary observance.

May the Republic of Italy experience prosperity, progress, and stability and may the friendship and common purpose between our countries and our peoples continue to flourish in the years ahead.●

PRESIDENT KAUNDA ADDRESSES JOINT HOUSE-SENATE INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS COMMITTEES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DIGGS) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. DIGGS. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, I inserted into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the remarks made on May 18, 1978, by President Kaunda of Zambia before the National Press Club. On that same date, His Excellency President Kaunda appeared before a special joint session of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the House International Relations Committee, to share with us his special insights and perspectives on the situation in Africa.

President Kaunda is recognized throughout the world for his leadership and wisdom, and I am happy to have this opportunity to share with my colleagues his remarks to the joint session of the House and Senate International Relations Committees:

ADDRESS BY HIS EXCELLENCY THE PRESIDENT OF ZAMBIA TO THE JOINT SESSION OF THE U.S. SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE AND THE HOUSE INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS COMMITTEE, MAY 18, 1978.

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, I welcome my meeting with you important members of the Legislative Branch of the American Leadership. We in Zambia recognise the role the United States Congress plays in determining America's policy towards the world. Being a super power, America's worldwide interests and America's response to threats to these interests have an impact on us in Zambia. Some of your decisions on Africa affect us. The very choice of an American President is now important to Africa. But Africa is also growing in importance. Africa's decisions affect American interests and American internal politics. As the future unfolds, the interaction of policies between Africa and the United States will grow. Our future is bound up with the future of the United States as a super power and a member of the United Nations.

Zambia is a young nation in a war-torn southern Africa. But the five million people are already in the forefront in dealing with issues of war and peace. Peace is an American national interest. It is also our national interest in Zambia.

I, therefore, come to you not to talk about war but the end of that war. I come to talk about peace and stability deeply rooted in freedom and justice to which Americans are so attached. I come to summon your conscience to crises which can be speedly resolved if Congress and the Executive Branch in Washington D.C. act in unison in the application of the noble principles inunciated by this nation's Founding Fathers: "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of happiness."

We in Zambia hold these same truths to be self-evident. We also hold them to be the cornerstone in the establishment of peace in Southern Africa. But we also know that unhappily for man, they are self-evident more in breach than in their observance. Wherever they are breached, conflict is inevitable.

In the search for peace in Southern Africa, there are those Americans who might say: The United States must not be involved; We do not want another Vietnam; We in Zambia support these people in their fears. Another Vietnam would be tragic. That is not what we seek. The character of American involvement we advocate is precisely designed to avoid a Vietnam-type war. It is wrong to think that America must not be involved. America is already involved in Southern Africa.

Southern Africa is already a public issue in the United States and there can be no running away from it. Any attempt to do so will not secure peace and will lead to a war even worse than Vietnam.

Southern Africa is a question of war or peace. If you do not believe us now, you will believe us when America faces the grim realities of racial conflagration compounded by ideological super power confrontation. Then it will be too late for American action.

Southern Africa is a matter of human rights which have become a major international concern.

Southern Africa is not only the melting pot of races and cultures. It is now also a melting pot of ideologies which will have a tremendous impact on American response in the future.

Southern Africa is an American national interest. Even as a non-aligned nation, we in Zambia know the extent of Western economic and strategic interests in the region.

Western nationals, Western supplies of oil and Western arms are all being used in a combative role in the war against the millions of the oppressed engaged in a just struggle for peace, freedom and justice which Americans love. The fact is that the West have been involved for many years in Southern Africa but on the wrong side.

What is Africa asking of America now?

We ask America to be involved on the side of right against wrong, on the side of justice against injustice.

We ask Congress to support President Carter's current initiative to solve the Zimbabwe and Namibian crises.

We ask the American Government, the U.S. Congress and the people of this great country to reject the Salisbury Agreement signed by Ian Smith and his black partners on March 3, this year. It is catastrophic. The so-called Interim Government is a recipe for civil war with all the dangers of external intervention. To accept the Salisbury Agreement is to legalise illegality and to sanctify abomination. We urge the United States Congress and leaders of Multi-national Corporations to support President Carter and the British Goverment in making full use of the success achieved in the Dar-es-Salaam round of the Anglo-American/Patriotic Front initiative. We must proceed speedly to the All-Party Conference to work out the measures for implementing the Anglo-American proposals.

We ask you to support the Carter Administration in taking even bolder measures for keeping the Namibian independence programme moving forward. We support the Western proposals on Namibia in principle. But we will remain doubtful about South Africa's sincerity and commitment to her declared acceptance of the proposals. We warn against Pretoria's tactics. These call for very careful analysis and decisive action against the racists. Pretoria's recent military attack on Angola was designed to sabotage the negotiations between SWAPO and the Five Western Members of the Security Council.

You can see that far from sounding war drums, we in Zambia sound the clarion call for peace. But not peace at any price. For peace without freedom and justice is not peace, but a negation of peace and a travesty of justice. The cause of peace in Southern Africa cannot be determined by Zambia and her frontline friends alone, but by all those directly involved. Liberation movements, Vorster, Smith, Americans, the British, Chinese, Soviets, the OAU, United Nations and many others are all involved in building peace in Southern Africa.

At this point, I must dispel some dangerous illusions which some policy-makers may harbour:

Africa has never advocated war against white regimes as a first option. War has always been thrust upon liberation movements. Liberation movements are not blood thirsty. They have always favoured negotiations where possible and have only taken up arms after all avenues to peaceful change have been exhausted.

Now war is being thrust upon frontline states. We are being forced to strengthen and expand our defense forces with the help of those nations ready to assist us.

Liberation movements have not turned to socialist countries as a first option. They have gone to socialist countries to seek aid only after America and the West have refused to assist them. Yet, Western arms still find their way to the enemies of human rights in Salisbury and Pretoria.

Socialist countries have not come running to the aid of Africa in a wide range of areas. Africa has invited them following Western rejection of our pleas for action. The West, for example, refused to build the Tanzania-Zambia Railway. So we asked the Chinese. They happily built the railway. The West also refused to assist the liberation movements in Angola, Mozambique and Guinea Bissau. Instead, Western countries backed the Portuguese fascist dictatorship, financially and militarily, and thereby enabled it to intensify the war against the nationalist forces. Liberation movements turned to socialist countries who assisted them to win independence. Socialist countries won. The West lost. The West will face more defeats unless there is a complete change in their aims and policy in Southern Africa. The allies of the oppressed and oppressors are known, not by their declarations, but by their actions.

There are those who say that the West is losing ground to the Soviets and the Chinese in Africa and who might seek support for minority regimes in an attempt to secure their interests against what is popularly called international communism. I say: if America and the West are losing ground, this is not Africa's choice. This is the choice of America and the West. Africa has done her part in appealing for American and Western action from the dawn of the struggle for independence. The policy measures which the Western Governments and their multinational corporations have taken over the last two decades in Southern Africa have been a rich recipe for today's eventuality.

The West can hardly gain ground by supporting minority regimes and their puppets whose end is certain because the time for the freedom of the majority has come.

I was here in Washington D.C. in April, 1975. I warned this nation of the dangers in Africa and called America's attention to her international duty. I was a voice in the wilderness. When America woke up the morning after Angola, a totally new chapter had opened. No amount of condemnation can put right the mistakes of the 1960s and the 1970s when Portugal should have granted independence to Angola through negotiations.

I recall how in 1976 former United States Secretary of State Dr. Henry Kissinger had the courage and kindness to tell me how right I was in April, 1975 and that had America heeded my advice early, the history of our region would have been different. He was right. America would have had diplomatic relations with Angola today. I also recall my response. I said: "In my culture, it is naughty for the young to tell the old that "I told you". I had been saying so since 1966 and I still say so now. So today I say: America, do not let me repeat this over Zimbabwe, Namibia and South Africa. Unfortunately, unless Congress supports the Carter Administration in facing the realities in Southern Africa, I fear that I am bound to say once again: "I told you". The choice is not mine, America, but yours and your allies. Vorster and Smith cannot last if the West chooses to end their racist policies. That choice must be made, made not in some distant future, but now. It will not be made in Southern Africa but here and in Western Europe.

Today, Cuban involvement in Africa has become a nightmare. For us in Zambia, this is sometimes a source of amusement and often great sadness indeed. Will America and the West ever make decisions on Africa based on the principles of love, freedom and justice, or will America and the West continue to react to the fear of the Soviet and Chinese power in Africa? Africa cannot feel secure in a world in which the basis of friendship among nations is fear and hatred of one another.

So let me say this: Cuban involvement is not the cause of instability and conflict in Southern Africa. Smith and Vorster are the twin agents of evil and the current conflict in that region.

Cubans will not come to Southern Africa as a result of our invitation. If they should come, that will be the choice of the West in allowing the regimes in Salisbury and Pretoria to create conditions for external intervention in the region. Smith is recruiting thousands of mercenaries from Western countries and is procuring more arms from the same source to fight liberation movements and frontline countries. It is sad but true that America and the West cannot give Zambia arms to fight Smith and Vorster. It would be easier for Zambia and other frontline states to obtain Western arms to fight Cubans and Soviets than to obtain arms to defend our nations againsct racist acts of aggression. This happens to be the reality today. This is why the recent attack by South African racist forces against Angola is potently dangerous and provocative. It must be stopped.

Since my arrival yesterday morning, President Carter and I have had frank, very cordial and fruitful discussions. He is a man I understand and admire. He and his administration understand the complexity and gravity of the situation and the need for urgent action to avert international conflict. He remains committed to the peace programme to which we have basically agreed. What President Carter needs is Congressional support from Capitol Hill. We in Zambia and Africa in general have supported and will continue to support any genuine effort to end the war and achieve majority rule. I urge Congress, I urge American corporations with interests in our region as well as the American people in general to give President Carter the support he greatly needs to get the programme which enjoys international support through to a successful end. American national interests are truly at stake. They will not be secured or promoted by the status quo, but by change, change not in some distant future, but now.

Time has run out for America and the West. Time has run out for victory in Southern Africa; but there is just an offchance that you can extract victory from the jaws of defeat. I have the language to cheat or mislead America; I have the language to tell the America people what they want to hear. But I have a conscience and cannot do so.

No American administration has acquired so many friends in Africa and enjoys such tremendous international support over its policy in Africa as the Carter Administration enjoys today. Let this achievement not go to waste. Let there be no new crisis of confidence. There are real hopes for ending the war in Zimbabwe and Namibia. We stand at the threshhold of peace in Zimbabwe and Namibia and Americans cannot afford to turn back and walk away from that victory for peace. Great has been the American contribution in the last few months.

It is against our commitment to build lasting peace in Southern Africa that I ask for Congressional support. With God's guidance we shall succeed in the interests of mankinds happy future. Thank you.●

REMARKS OF MAYOR NEIL GOLDSCHMIDT OF PORTLAND, OREG., RE: TUITION TAX CREDIT

man from Oregon (Mr. ULLMAN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ULLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit for the RECORD excerpts from a recent speech by Mayor Neil Goldschmidt of Portland, Oreg. His remarks are eloquent and, in my judgment, help sharpen the focus on a very important part of what is at issue in this debate. I hope my colleagues will consider his words carefully.

The speech follows:

SPEECH BY NEIL GOLDSCHMIDT TO CHURCH WOMEN UNITED, MAY 5, 1978

I want to talk to you about something that I think is a "promise we have to keep" to ourselves, and I hope that you will hear me out to the end because it's a subject about which I have not spoken publicly before.

There is no promise that we have to keep that is more important than our promise to our children. That is not just for the children of Neil Goldschmidt, or the children of people in this room; it's to the children of this country for an eternity.

I would like to talk to you about a proposal that has been moving around the halls of Congress and has become extremely controversial. It is the proposal that would provide a so-called "tuition tax credit" of up to $500 per child for the cost of enrolling children in private schools.

I want to say to you today that I think this proposal, if it were enacted by Congress and signed into law by the President of the United States, would be disastrous to the cities of America; it would be disastrous to our urban public schools; it would be disastrous to this country's public school system. And, in the long run, those two put together mean nothing but tragedy for all of us.

The proposal I am talking about is called the Packwood-Moynihan Bill, but there are others who have participated in it. It was passed out of the U.S. Senate Finance Committee, and it has been called by some as the major domestic legislation of the year because of its political consequences. What it says is that by 1980, families can deduct from their income taxes, up to $500 for each tuition paying student in college, vocational, elementary or secondary school.

It is being pushed or advocated to relieve the income tax burden on middle class Americans—of whom I suspect there are a fair number in this room, on your way into or out of the middle class—those Americans who it is argued over the last 5 to 10 years have lost ground, compared to lower and higher income Americans, as a result of inflation.

Let me say to you that I think it is nothing but a fad, and a bad one at that. I think it panders to our worst instincts and leads us on to treacherous grounds. President Paul Bragdon of Reed College, one of our most distinguished private schools and one that would be presumed to most benefit from this legislation, has put it this way: "Our representatives in Congress have suddenly discovered the plight and anger of the middle class and have been jostling with each other ever since to be the most zealous in pressing the new cause of relief for the middle-income family." Even more serious, I think that this legislation is a reflection of a Congress that, unfortunately, appears to be increasingly unable to tackle those problems that are of a fundamental concern—and I know there are lots of them: you have concerns about why I don't catch the dogs in your neighborhood, you have concerns about how bad the streets may get after the winter, you have concerns about kids who wreck your property and this or that—but I want to put in a "fundamental" category—a house for every American, a decent education for every American, a job for every American, good health, and I think, obviously, in retirement it is the right to enjoy the investment you've made in our society. And I think, increasingly, that this legislation is a reflection of a Congress that is feeling obliged to offer our American public something, if only fads, which are only quick and easy answers.

Now, if tax reform, which we have all advocated—a simplified tax system, a fairer tax system—is one of those fundamental concerns, and I happen to think it is—I think the President is right about that—then let's reform the tax structure. On the other hand, if what is fundamental is the quality and viability of our public school system, and I think it is, then let's not tinker with our tax code in a way that will destroy the school system.

What is at stake, here, in your Mayor's view, if I am able to put it in those terms, is the most basic of our American egalitarian traditions: to provide the best, and support the best, free public school system that we can. What this tax credit proposal would do is to provide a free, or perhaps a half-free, private school system, not for all Americans, but for just those who can afford it. And according to the Congressional budget office, those people would be predominately those families with incomes between $30,000 and $50,000 a year. How long can a nation, which provides choice only to those who can afford it, remain united? I think not for long.

Now, how would this legislation impact your City school system? Let me just describe it to you as I see it. First, nothing we have learned, in the years since World War II, about our City and the public school system is more critical than the fact I want to describe to you now. If the population which feeds the public school system is not reasonably balanced between children from families with educational ties, educational motivation, and generally some education background in their family; between those families that are employed and unemployed; if the school population ends up being the children of mostly unemployed, mostly welfare families, and mostly people who have never worked, you will not have a good public school system. You cannot tax yourself into a good school system, you cannot wish yourself into a good school system, and unfortunately, you can't even volunteer yourself into a good school system. Nothing appears to be more critical than the environment in the classroom, and that environment is, in fact, produced by the children who are there and the teacher that you pay for. And if all of those children come from families of the poor, then unfortunately the quality of education in our classrooms will not be good.

The Coleman report, which was the basis for the beginning of busing to accomplish racial integration in the United States, in my view has been misread. Because what it talked about and was read to say was that we must racially integrate our classrooms, when I think what it really means is that we need to economically integrate our classrooms, so that we do not have classrooms in one part of the City for the rich, and another part of the City for the middle income, and somewhere else for the poor. And the fact is that children of poor families will end up not geting the kind of education that we want.

And so I am saying to you that if you can provide to our society more incentives for working families to pull their children out of the public school system, two things will happen: our hope for maintaining a belief in equal access and equal opportunity in the United States will be pushed a step closer to death. And secondly, I think that you will find that your taxes will go up as the government tries to compensate for the quality of classrooms that we have just demolished.

Now let me talk about Portland. If you don't know, you should understand that as of this date only 18% of the people who vote in Portland Public School elections actually have children in the Portland Public Schools. It is very difficult for the school system to sell people on paying additional taxes.

And in my view, next fall's election for a new tax base, which would settle the schools financing for Portland, Oregon for the next 5 years, is the most single, critical election in the last 25 years in this City's history. If it loses, I think the whole town will be ill; you won't see it overnight, but within 5 years I predict they'll cut a thousand people off the school payroll, many if not most of them teachers, and the motivated and some of the most gifted children in those classrooms and their parents will have found another city to live in. We will lose their volunteerism in our neighborhoods, we will lose them in our churches, we will lose them in our City government. We will not just lose them from our schools. Now, if we provide a reason for those families to pull out of the school system—and there are already only 18 percent, and we provide it to the people who already have the best education and the most choice, the number will drop below 18 percent. Those who have the best ability to make the school system perform, because they demand a quality education for their children, very well could be gone.

Last year, our Portland Public Schools cut $7 million from its budget, another $2.4 million this year, and next year, it faces a $9.3 million deficit. Why? Because in spite of the fact of what I think is a rather aggressive effort to try to find resources for the Portland Public School system, you should understand that our school system does not benefit equally with the rest of the state in state support for education. Enough on that subject. But I want to say to you, this: you own today! Own it! You payed for it, you built it out of your pockets; most of the people in this room are older than I am, and my children are going to school in buildings you payed for. I didn't pay for them, and I thank you for it. My son and daughter both attend Portland public schools, and we enjoy an education that you are helping to provide. But you should realize that you can throw all of that down the drain. What is all that? Do you know that the Portland Public School System's SAT and Achievement scores consistently run above the national averages? This is not a crummy school system. It is a good system that needs to be made better. Our educational performance has put to rest, a Public school in a large city has to be mediocre.

The passage of the Packwood/Moynihan Bill, in my view, throws up just one more obstacle and disincentive in a long series of obstacles and disincentives, to our nation's cities. Let me summarize what it will do: siphon off more of our school system's most able and most motivated students; it would cost the Federal Treasury as much as $5.3 billion; it would undermine an already burdened school finance tax base; and it calls into question the constitutional issue of church and state. It would undermine a national principle, our strong tradition of support for our public school system, and it could destroy all of the efforts of people like you in this room, and thousands of others, God love them, who have been struggling house by house, neighborhood by neighborhood, in our community, all over America, as well as in Portland, to rebuild the cities, to have a city of people that work, to have a city of people participating in their city in school decisions, building a life for all people of all backgrounds and all incomes.●

TOWARD A MORE ENLIGHTENED COMMUNICATIONS POLICY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. VAN DEERLIN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. VAN DEERLIN. Mr. Speaker, next week the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FREY) and I will be introducing an omnibus bill looking toward an almost total revision of the outdated Communications Act of 1934. Many of the solutions our bill suggests—solutions to problems induced by a technology that has changed rapidly and radically since enactment of the present law—will doubtless be controversial. And they will stimulate heavy lobbying by affected industrial interests.

I therefore urge colleagues, insofar as is possible, to avoid making early commitments on any and all phases of our proposed legislation. As full information develops through hearings and other modes of input, I think an impartial observer will come to agree that basic change is needed if the U.S. public is to enjoy the full fruits of American ingenuity and enterprise in broadcasting, telephone service, land mobile operations, data transmission, and the other commercial and socially significant facets of modern communication.

One Member of Congress who has become something of an expert in problems surrounding telephone regulation is the gentleman from Washington, DON BONKER. I regret that Mr. BONKER is not a member of the House Commerce Committee, and especially our Subcommittee on Communications. Despite other prime legislative interests, he has found time to make his way through the labyrinth intricate accounting procedures and regulatory processes that surround America's vast telephone interconnection system.

Mr. BONKER was a recent speaker before his home State's Independent Telephone Association. One need not agree with every conclusion he has reached to appreciate that Mr. BONKER well understands the problems we face in stimulating the competition that will keep our intercity phone service the best in the world. His is an excellent example of an open mind at work.

Mr. Speaker, I commend Mr. BONKER's remarks to the attention of his colleagues as we start down the legislative road to a new Communications Act:

REMARKS OF REPRESENTATIVE DON L. BONKER

Two years ago, what I knew about the telephone system was that it worked, it worked better and better each year, and cost less and less each year for the service provided.

Two years ago, when someone said "separations," I thought of marriages breaking up. When someone said "settlements" I thought of Egypt and Israel dividing up the Sinai Desert.

Today I am not sure I really understand all that I should about the telephone system, but as a result of the work you and your colleagues in the Bell system have done, I do understand that "separations and settlements" have to do with the happy marriage between Bell and the independent telephone companies, and that things are changing all too rapidly within the telephone industry. I doubt that any one member of Congress has a sure grasp of what to do about the challenges which face you, but if we even understand the problem, you have come a long way in the last two years.

Before I get into what I understand the current situation to be, let me say a few words about how industry did get us to focus on the critical issues.

TOO MUCH TO CHEW ON

As you know, the industry strategy in 1976 was to go all out to get sponsors for the Consumer Communication Reform Act. I recall John DeButts (President of A.T. & T.) telling Congress that nothing short of immediate adoption of that bill in its entirety would prevent the collapse of the truly marvelous telephone system developed in the United States during this century.

But that bill was a big bite to chew and swallow all at once.

The section of the bill which spelled out "Congressional findings" required a willingness on the part of the Congressman sponsoring the bill to resolve with no more thought than the stroke of a pen issues and factual disputes which have consumed millions of man-hours of research and contention between regulators and the industry and their allied consultants.

The "Congressional findings" outlined in the bill ratified all industry contentions about technical integrity of the phone system, the direction and degree of subsidies between types of service, the structure of the industry—in short the status quo prior to the FCC decisions which opened the door to competition in terminal equipment and specialized long distance service.

I am not saying that Congress may not conclude that these findings are all correct—merely that it was unrealistic to expect more than one or two Congressmen—if that many—to sponsor the bill and be able to stand up and explain in detail the reasons for all those findings. But I, like many of my colleagues, like to be able to do that.

If I approached you with the following resolution, I expect you might hesitate to endorse it without a little thought and considerable study:

"Whereas, the Congress has written laws which provide for the common good;

Whereas, Congress has enacted no harmful or useless legislation;

Whereas, bureaucrats more often than not bungle the good that Congress has done,

Be it resolved, that everything enacted by Congress is endorsed and any problems associated with laws passed by Congress have occurred because of bureaucratic bungling."

Now, that is an obviously absurd example, but it points to the reason some of us resisted a simple endorsement of the Consumer Communication Reform Act.

CONGRESSIONAL SCRUTINY OVERDUE

From the outset, I have been convinced the industry is raising very real, very significant problems and issues which need to be quickly resolved. But I was uncomfortable with a strategy which allowed us not to raise questions.

The so-called "Options Paper" prepared by staff of the House Subcommittee on Communications makes clear that both industry structure, especially the degree of competition, and rate structure (what classes of users should be subsidized, how the subsidies work, who should decide subsidy levels) are issues needing Congressional review. As the "Option Paper" stated: "There are profound reasons for reviewing the current rate structure . . . so it may well be that rate structure policies should be changed irrespective of the outcome of the debate over competition." Yet the industry bill seemed to preclude that possibility at all. As originally proposed, it was explicit that current rate structure possibilities are as they should be and that only existing industry structure can maintain the existing rate policies.

Well, we have gone beyond that initial stage in the debate. The Consumer Communication Reform Act has served its purpose. The issues are before Congress and will be resolved. That is not to say they will be resolved wisely, but the issues are on the agenda.

And I must say that I believe the industry has come a long way since 1976. The most recent industry proposals are much closer to my own views of what a communications policy should be. Of course, I am still a real layman in telecommunications policy, so you may want to take my views accordingly.

As a layman I begin with these relatively unsophisticated beliefs:

We should provide basic, switched telephone service to all people at roughly equal rates;

Within a basic commitment to that policy, limited and regulated competition should be possible in clearly defined new areas of communication;

The degree to which we wish to subsidize certain classes of telephone users should be very explicit and should be decided by representatives of the people; and

Competition must be closely enough regulated that it does not impinge upon the integrity and low cost universal service of the basic switched telephone network. (There have been lots of acronyms thrown around in this debate—WATS, MTS, SCC, NPSTN. The one I like best, however, stands for "plain old telephone service," or POTS.)

Reserving the right to explore in a little more depth, I believe the industry has come close in its so-called "framework for resolution of the problem" to my simple beliefs.

COMPETITION BY DEGREES

As I understand that framework, the industry has outlined four categories of service, with varying degrees of competition to be allowed in each.

The first category is the basic nationwide switched telephone network, which should be insulated from the effects of competition.

The second category is specialized long distance services which require an interconnect with the basic switched phone network.

This service could be provided by the telephone companies, a specialized carrier, or the customer himself. The industry rightly points out that any such service should share in helping to subsidize local service, just as does other long distance service. Having stated that principle, however, does not resolve the issue of how large the access charge should be. That is obviously the critical issue if there is to be any competition at all in this category of service.

The third category of service would be straight-forward point-to-point service with no interconnection through the basic phone system. It would be highly competitive in the long run.

The fourth category of service would allow controlled competition in terminal equipment.

What is striking to me about these proposals is that they appear to represent a real movement within the industry to come to grips with evolving technology and the prospects for competition. In 1976, I was told by telephone company people that any competition would be ultimately destructive of low-cost, universal service. The latest industry proposals appear to be much more realistic and a much better basis for setting public policy. That does not mean the debate is settled for me or for the Congress, but you have given us something solid to work with.

The framework proposed by the industry focuses on competition and basic industry structure. It is not as detailed with regard to rate structure policies.

And I fully expect that there will be debate over rate policies. The issue is more complex than a simple choice between rate averaging and cost-basis pricing. As you know there is considerable dispute between experts over whether "value of service" pricing of business service and long distance service is too high, too low or just right. There is in fact dispute over what yardstick you use to determine whether prices are right or wrong.

The industry itself seems to accept that, for some very limited services—namely directory assistance—cost-based pricing is both practical and wise public policy.

However, I do harbor the suspicion that when all is said about pricing policies, we may conclude that simple rate averaging and value of service pricing are the only truly practical methods open. There may be refinements, such as "life-line" service for the poor, but the refinements may just as well go in the opposite direction from "cost-basis pricing" as toward it.

CONCERN FOR RURAL AREAS

Finally, let me note that I have been encouraged from the beginning of the debate that even the most pro-competition elements within the Federal Communication have recognized that rural phone users are the most vulnerable of all classes of customers to the potentially harmful effects of competition.

It now appears that the House Subcommittee on Communications will have a staff-prepared draft of legislation in June. At this point I am sorry that I cannot tell you what will be in that draft for the simple reason that no one is talking. You will probably know as soon as I, if not sooner.

But going on at the same time is a lot of flailing around within the courts and the FCC that indicates the fundamental lack of resolution over basic issues. The FCC presently has in its mill a study of basic separation and settlements policy, an inquiry into whether WATS and basic long distance service (message toll service, or MTS) should be opened to competition, and development of a new uniform system of accounts. And a very recent Court of Appeals decision has thrown into confusion just what yardsticks the FCC should use for determining whether to require interconnection of specialized common carriers with the basic switched phone network.

Congress had best get down to cases on these fundamental issues. You can help us through the continuing of the sort of work the industry task force has recently done. We are past the stage of signing up sponsors and generating resolutions, and as long as we all recognize that, you can count on my help in moving Congress toward action.●

NOTES FOR THE SUMMIT: FROM OVERALL DEMAND EXPANSION TO STRUCTURAL IMPROVEMENTS; FROM MACRO TO MICRO

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. REUSS) is recognized for 30 minutes.

● Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, the present world economic situation, seen from the United States, resembles the library in Alice's Looking-Glass House, where "the books are something like our books, only the words go the wrong way." In the United States, growth is up, overall unemployment has come down, and accelerating inflation is now the predominant public worry. Elsewhere, especially in Europe, growth remains slow, unemployment remains high, and inflation rates, on average, are still declining.

The International Monetary Fund now projects an average real GNP growth of only 2.8 percent for all European countries in 1978. Chancellor Denis Healy of Britain has stated the problem facing Europe in unequivocal terms:

> The present outlook is not a satisfactory one . . . There is a serious risk of rising unemployment, (of) growing pressures for protection, and (of) being trapped in a deflationary spiral.

When the heads of state of the major non-Communist industrial nations meet in Bonn this July, Mr. Healy's warnings will be at the top of the agenda.

High employment without accelerating inflation remains the goal, as pressing and as elusive as ever. Moreover, as our leaders prepare to meet, they do so realizing that the next major boost to world recovery must come with the United States largely on the sidelines. Our economy, running far closer to capacity than any other, with a huge trade deficit, and with rising domestic political pressures for fiscal restraint, can expect to contribute very little incremental demand growth to the export sectors of our major trading partners in the months ahead.

The United States has played the leadership role in the world recovery until now; it is time for the others to catch up.

For us, there is a new and far more challenging leadership role ahead, to which I shall shortly turn. But, speaking strictly of the necessary additional boosts to effective world demand, it is time for the Europeans, together with the already marching Japanese and the stronger members of the Third World, to take decisive action on their own.

The world situation is, in short, bleak, but by no means in crisis. The Interim Committee of the IMF, meeting in Mexico City last April, has reached a consensus on a global strategy for coordinated economic growth. Abandoning "locomotives," this strategy demands contributions from the full spectrum of industrial nations, not simply the United States, Germany, and Japan. It explodes the myth of "export-led growth" for strong countries as a group, recognizing, in effect, that widespread policies of "glut-thy-neighbor" can be destructive. The IMF strategy recognizes that the contribution of each country to world growth must be geared to its individual capacity for growth—to the present size of its gap between actual and potential GNP.

Where this is large, as in Germany and Japan, relatively large increments to domestic demand and output are called for—enough to close the GNP gap by 1 to 1½ points per year through 1980. Where the GNP gap is smaller but still substantial, as in Canada, France, Italy, and the United Kingdom, slower rates of GNP gap reduction, averaging one-half of 1 percent per annum, are suggested. And in the case of the United States, where resource utilization in the manufacturing sector is only 5 percent below estimated potential, the strategy prescribes a sensible course of steady expansion at about 4 percent per year in 1979 and 1980. At the macro-level, the heads of state assembling in Bonn could hardly do better than to announce the specific, realistic policies they intend to put into effect, in order to achieve the coordinated expansion of the global economy on which the Interim Committee has agreed.

I will be surprised—mildly and pleasantly, to be sure, but nonetheless surprised—if the Interim Committee's millenium actually comes to pass. This is because there is a fly in the ointment; as always, it is inflation.

Many Germans, in particular, remain deeply sceptical of the ability of conventional demand management—tax reduction and easy money—to work its orthodox Keynesian magic. German households, they say, simply save the added income. Moreover, labor markets remain tight, despite substantial unemployment, because the labor force participation rate of qualified German workers is declining, and because the social expenditure—hospital beds, schools, and so on—required by qualified guest-workers is rising, making the authorities reluctant to admit them. In such tight labor markets, increases in demand quickly translate into increased money wages and prices, squeezing profits and discouraging investment. So, in Germany and elsewhere, there are and will continue to be respectable voices urging against the strong commitment to international collaboration that the IMF consensus position represents.

Is there a way out of the dilemma of labor-short, inflation-prone industrial nations?

I am convinced that there is, and that it is up to the United States to prove it. The challenge is threefold. First, we must contain the cost-push inflation now raging here and around the world. Second, we must conquer structural unemployment, and in the process train the labor force we need for the next generation of postindustrial growth. Third, we must lay the basis for a sustained expansion of investment, both public and private, in job-creating technologies, housing, urban reconstruction, environmental control, and energy conservation; in short, a program of wealth creation that will improve standards of living well into the 21st century.

What I propose, in a word, is a substantial reversal of the conventional mismatch of policy tools to economic targets. In the United States, traditionally, monetary and tax policy has aimed at controlling aggregate demand, supplemented by Government expenditures designed to help people rendered dependent by these macroeconomic monetary and tax policies.

The result, increasingly, has been tight skilled labor markets and rising inflation at high levels of unemployment, a large semipermanent welfare population, and the effective stifling of investment by high interest rates at just the moment when the approach of capacity constraints would signal the need for huge amounts of new industrial equipment and the social infrastructure that new or renewed industrial centers require.

Why not, instead, direct monetary policy to assure that we get our needed investment, tax policy to encourage the deceleration of inflation, and Government spending to create the durable social and human capital that sustained growth and social equity both require? In the process, new workers can be trained, structural unemployment and welfare populations reduced, and our cities converted to attractive residential and cultural communities.

Furthermore, if the Government guarantees to private business the complementary social capital to new industrial development, and if policies to hold down the growth of money wages work, and if monetary policy performs its new assignment well, then private business will respond with the resources, initiative, and imagination to insure that sustainable, profitable industrial development or redevelopment occurs. In short, we need to develop policies geared to the specific components of aggregate demand—investment, real incomes (hence consumption), and autonomous Government spending—rather than to aggregate demand as an amorphous whole. If this can be done, and done with sufficient care, then a separate policy to manipulate aggregate demand as a whole may not even be needed once high employment is achieved.

This is the model we should create for our allies and friends in Germany, Japan, and the rest of the industrial world. It means getting rid of the obsolete, tired macroeconomic obsession that we have been dishing out to ourselves and our friends abroad. And high time, too.

What, specifically, is to be done? Happily, the Carter administration and the Federal Reserve System under Chairman Miller are already moving in the right direction. What is chiefly needed is that one and all recognize the direction, the logic, and the necessity of the drift, and respond with more, more, and still more of the same. Let me outline the steps:

1. MONETARY POLICY

The Federal Reserve has for years anointed itself as the only anti-inflationary game in town. Under the new Chairman, however, there have been hints of willingness to concede this turf to the administration, in return for a determined show of fiscal restraint and dedication to structural anti-inflationary reform. The administration has at least partially delivered on both counts, by reducing the projected tax cut from $25 to $19 billion, and by naming the indefatigable Robert Strauss to promote every cost-cutting, price-restraining, and wage-dealing bargain he can think of, short of outright violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Now the Federal Reserve should respond. At the very least, it should announce the suspension of the 6.5-percent ceiling on the annual growth rate of M1 that is in effect for the next three quarters. The ceiling is already unrealistic; to achieve it would require a degree of contraction that I doubt even hardliners at the Fed seriously desire. So I suggested in my May 19, 1978, letter to the Fed:

MAY 19, 1978.

Hon. G. WILLIAM MILLER,
Chairman, Board of Governors, Federal Reserve System, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CHAIRMAN MILLER: I am pleased to confirm your appearance at our next set of hearings on the Conduct of Monetary Policy, to be held on July 20, beginning at 10 a.m. In preparation for these hearings, may I call your attention to one troublesome aspect of the Federal Reserve's present practices?

As you know, I have supported your efforts to lift the cloak of unnecessary secrecy that has often surrounded monetary policy in the past. At the moment, I strongly support your announced intention to respond to the recent anti-inflationary fiscal initiatives of the Administration and Congress—initiatives that have cut the anticipated Federal budget deficit by $10 billion in fiscal 1979—with a relaxed monetary posture, designed to encourage investment and to sustain the present pace of economic growth. I am concerned, however, that such policy shifts, desirable in themselves, may generate a damaging climate of uncertainty about the Federal Reserve's real intentions when they are unaccompanied by a full review of their impact on previously announced monetary targets and objectives.

The present ceiling target of 6.5 percent for growth of the narrowly defined money stock (M1) in 1978 is a case in point. With the rapid rise in production in March and April, M1 has recovered fully from its mid-winter doldrums, achieving an annual growth rate averaging 7.0 percent over the past six months, and 8.5 percent over the past quarter. The pace is accelerating at the present time. There seems little likelihood that, left to itself, M1 growth would subside into the announced target ranges over the year as a whole. With a projected expansionary shift in monetary policy—which, as I say, I support—this almost certainly will not happen. It would surely seem appropriate, therefore, for the Federal Open Market Committee to adjust upward the target bands for monetary growth, especially the unrealistic ceiling target for M1.

Ideally, money growth targets, once announced, should be met. But just as the ideal of a balancd budget should be set aside in the face of pressing unemployment, or on the other hand, demand-pull inflation, so should the ideal of steady monetary growth be laid aside when changing conditions require it. If nominal GNP (real growth plus inflation) is expected to increase 11 percent this year, as the Wharton econometric model now predicts, and if M1 velocity grows near its trend rate of 3–3.5 percent, then M1 growth within the announced 6.5 percent ceiling is improbable, to say the least. Not that the Federal Reserve should necessarily validate every penny of expected inflation. But the Federal Reserve should not hold to targets that, in light of subsequent events, suggest a degree of contraction that the Federal Reserve does not intend to impose. In the short run, this sparks the fear that the Federal Reserve does indeed intend to tighten credit, at the risk of raising unemployment, in order to reconcile actual money growth with the targets. Over the longer run, the credibility of the Federal Reserve is brought into question, as it finds itself persistently underestimating monetary growth and overshooting its own objectives. Both unnecessarily upset financial markets.

May I suggest that, in preparation for your next target-setting Open Market Committee meeting on July 18, you explore with your colleagues the possibility of temporarily raising the ceiling in which the Fed has imprisoned itself? I hope that at our next set of hearings you will be able to present a realistic set of targets for the year beginning in the third quarter of 1978, as well as revisions of the target ranges already in effect, designed to make them more consistent with the current economic climate. If there are members of the Federal Open Market Committee who dissent from the majority position on any changes, I would appreciate hearing the reasons for such dissent.

Sincerely,

HENRY S. REUSS,
Chairman.

Better yet, perhaps in exchange for further anti-inflationary moves from the White House and the Congress, the Federal Open Market Committee could determine and announce its intention to hold short-term interest rates at their current levels, taken advantage of whatever opportunities to lower them that business conditions present. Such an announced policy could have a fixed term, say 6 months, or it could be contingent on a desired magnitude of domestic borrowing—the maximum consistent with not-overfull employment in the capital goods and housing industries. This would be, in short, a sustained effort to allow small and medium businesses (who rely on borrowed funds) and potential homebuyers (who also do) to make plans for new investment contingent on a known and fixed maximum cost of funds. Such a policy, albeit experimental in nature, could make a significant contribution to expanding and modernizing our productive base at that crucial time.

2. TAX POLICY

A chief function of tax policy, one which the IMF Interim Committee has strongly endorsed, should forthwith become the control and discouragement of inflation. There is a vast array of sales and excise taxes that enter into costs and hence prices; some of these, such as those on airline tickets and long-distance telephone calls, the administration is already pledged to reduce or discard. But the most pernicious example is the payroll tax of the social security system. Here the Carter administration's attitude is a puzzle: Having once backed the substitution of general revenues for payroll taxes in the social security trust fund, and lost, they have just booted away a near-golden opportunity to reverse the verdict against them and come up a winner. A rollback in the payroll tax rate to 5.85 percent, and a repeal of rate increases scheduled to take effect in the future, could have increased real wages and reduced marginal labor costs, thus delivering a blow against both unemployment and inflation this year. The Carter administration should get its head together on this issue, and come back before Congress as soon as possible with a corrected position.

Tax policy can also be deployed directly against wage-and-price-push inflation. In this area, the United States can learn from Britain, which is already offering tax breaks in return for wage restraint, and for Germany, Austria, and Sweden, which have long based their anti-inflation policies on a real-wage bargain at the national level.

Happily, we are not short of ideas on how to proceed. Arthur Okun, Sidney Weintraub, and Henry Wallich have done yeoman service in developing plans for tax-based incomes policies (TIP) that deserve careful study. A competent body, such as the Council on Wage and Price Stability (COWPS) should begin at once to analyze the feasibility, effectiveness, and administrative costs of various legislative designs. If Governor Wallich wishes to shanghai a few dozen of the Federal Reserve's 800 certificated economists into the act, he can do so with my blessing. For unless we are prepared with alternatives, we may be forced to choose between recession and direct controls if inflation gets worse.

3. STRUCTURAL EMPLOYMENT POLICY

As we move toward high employment of prime age white males, the urgency of shifting employment policy in favor of structurally disadvantaged groups—minorities, women, teenagers—becomes more and more apparent. Our goal, I believe, should be to create 1 million new jobs for the hard-to-employ over the next 3 years. These jobs should be in the private sector to the maximum extent, with the public sector absorbing what the private sector cannot. Dr. Lawrence Klein of the Wharton School assures me that this can be done. I have, in my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for March 21, 1978 (7899–7902), described some ways to lower both unemployment and inflation:

By creating a network of federally supported, nonprofit local employment councils, on the model of Chicago United, a broad-based private coalition of white and minority businesses that contracts directly with the Federal Government for job-creating money, designed to cut redtape and link hard-to-employ persons to available jobs wherever they may exist. The funding of these councils could be directly tied to their efficiency in effecting job placements.

By a Federal wage subsidy to employers who hire people with disadvantaged backgrounds in jobs with significant training components. The President's proposed targeted employment tax credit is an important start in this direction. It should be implemented, monitored, and expanded as soon as it shows signs of bearing fruit.

By a sustained effort to finance new private economic development in areas where disadvantaged people live. The President's proposed National Development Bank is, again, a hopeful beginning, which deserves careful, sympathetic scrutiny by the Congress.

By expanded programs of complementary infrastructure for new economic development: housing rehabilitation and construction, mass transit, and new public works. These should be oriented to the reconstruction, maintenance, and improved livability of existing urban centers, rather than, as so often in the past, to indiscriminate new building for which no adequate maintenance provisions have been made.

By an expanded program of public service employment, up to double the present level of 725,000 jobs.

By avoiding self-inflicted inflationary wounds.

4. CURRENCY STABILIZATION: A NONISSUE

So far, I have said nothing about the need for a policy to sustain the international value of the dollar. That is because, to be blunt, such a policy is not needed. Some window dressing aside, we do not have an exchange stabilization policy at the present time. Last January and February, the administration came under strong pressure to attempt, in effect, to peg the value of the dollar in terms of the mark. Interest rates were raised, and some intervention undertaken, but by-and-large the pressure was resisted. What happened? The crisis passed, and exchange rates in recent weeks have dropped almost altogether out of the news. Now virtually all members of the IMF Interim Committee agree that currency instability is not the cause, and currency stabilization schemes are not the cure, of the current world economic imbalance. These international aspects of the dollar I discussed at length in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for March 9, 1978 (pages 6355–6357).

To what extent, then, can our American attack on nagging structural, inflation, and environmental problems serve as a model for our allies and friends? The answer should be clear. Up to a point, orthodox Keynesian remedies—a boost to aggregate demand via tax reduction and easy money—may be what our largest OECD partners need. When these measures begin to flag, some additional mileage can be obtained by extending credit on relatively easy terms to Third World nations eager to purchase industrial goods. But this extender too has its limits: the ability of many Third World nations to absorb new debt is not great.

Ultimately, therefore, all must turn to specific structural initiatives, designed to raise employment, counter cost-push inflation, and create a permanent addition to national wealth. The needs are apparent:

In cities as disparate as Tokyo and Naples, massive construction of new sewage and water pollution control facilities are needed.

Along the Thames and the Ruhr, great improvements in water quality have been made. Dozens of other fouled rivers cry out for similar attention.

In Paris and London, new art and theater complexes are enriching the national cultural life. How much more talent lies undiscovered for want of a stage in a thousand provincial cities of the wealthy world?

Along the Clyde and in Belfast, great shipbuilding centers lie idle or underutilized. Why not convert them into modern industrial centers?

Except for Norway and Great Britain, all Europe suffers from a near-total reliance on imported oil. Japan is in a similar position. Yet where is the innovation in solar, wind, and (who knows?) biomass power that European and Japanese genius could produce?

Earlier phases of European building gave us much of what we treasure in our esthetic heritage. Now, what is needed is restoration, preservation, and "catch-up" by those sectors that are left behind. While it may be said that much of the United States is rich in private and poor in public buildings—theaters, museums, palaces, parks—in much of Europe the situation is reversed. How much work could be done, in renovating the decayed interiors of the stately apartments and townhouses of a great city like Paris.

The chiefs of state of the major Western industrial nations will meet in Bonn this July under conditions of great urgency and great promise. Our partners have their work cut out for them, and so do we. Our tasks, in the immediate present, are not the same. But, to a great extent, the imagination and leadership which the United States can show, in coping successfully with the problems of structural unemployment and cost-push inflation, in laying the groundwork for new growth and revitalization of our existing great industrial and commercial centers, will serve as the model for our partners when, soon or late, they reach the limits of Keynesian demand expansion.●

CHARLES R. SMITH CONCLUDES A REMARKABLE 45 YEARS OF SERVICE TO THE CONGRESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from West Virginia (Mr. STAGGERS) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow one of the most faithful members of the Capitol staff will conclude 45 years of service to the Congress. Charles R. Smith, better known as "Smitty" to his friends and associates, will retire from the position of engineer in charge of the the House wing of the Capitol.

"Smitty" is such an unassuming person I am afraid we are inclined to take for granted his diligent efforts to keep our place of business cool in summer, warm in winter, and the mechanical services functioning, but that is mainly because he does his work so well.

One of his responsibilities has been the assignment of elevator operators to the House wing, and he has taken a personal interest in the scores of students and young people employed to operate the elevators over the years. More than anyone knows, "Smitty" has encouraged and aided these youngsters to further their education, many times at his own personal sacrifice.

Mr. Smith's duties come under the Architect of the Capitol, and Architect George M. White declares that while Smitty will be missed by hundreds of associates here, no one will miss him more "as a good friend and exemplary employee."

Mr. Smith came to Washington in 1932 under the sponsorship of the late Congressman Lynn S. Hornor of Clarksburg, W. Va., where Smitty had been born, the son of the late Charles P. and Sara A. Smith.

Smitty and his wife, Geraldine, live at 2416 59th Avenue in Cheverly, Md., but their immediate retirement plans call for returning to West Virginia to their recently completed leisure home on the Buckhannon River near Buckhannon, and to just enjoy those wonderful West Virginia hills. His address there will be General Delivery, Buckhannon, W. Va. 26201.

As his associates gather to express their affection and good wishes this Friday afternoon, I know I may, on behalf of everyone in the Capitol community, thank Smitty for the fine service he has rendered, the comfort he has made possible for all of us, and the valued friendship this genteel gentleman has so generously and unreservedly extended.

May God keep you, Smitty, and your good wife, Geraldine, through many, many years of the happiness you have earned.●

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my colleague in extending our thanks, our congratulations, and our very best wishes to House engineer Charles R. Smith on the occasion of his retirement after a remarkable 45 years of service.

Puffing on his pipe, his lips curled in a smile, a twinkle in his eyes, "Smitty" is a familiar and friendly image to the hundreds of staff personnel who make up the Capitol "underground." He will be missed.

To give you a measure of this diligence, one of our minority staff officers was in the Capitol last Saturday afternoon, and he just wondered if, at the end of 45 years, Smitty might be working his last Saturday on a Memorial Day weekend. So he slipped down to room HB–15, and sure enough, who was keeping the watch but the ever-faithful Charlie Smith.

Enjoy your retirement, Smitty.

● Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, through war, depression, energy crises, and all sorts of events that have raised the heat and decibel level here in the House, one faithful servant of the Congress has made it his business to be sure we kept our cool.

Keeping our Chamber comfortable, the heat and humidity properly regulated, and the elevators functioning has been the major concern of House engineer-in-charge Charles R. Smith, for most of the 45 years of his service here which he concludes tomorrow.

A commendable career which he has pursued with quiet competence and selfless devotion, which has greatly facilitated the work of the Congress—to whom goes all the glory.

May your retirement years be as rewarding for you, "Smitty," as your service has certainly been for all of us.●

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and to include therein extraneous material on the subject of the special order today by the gentleman from West Virginia (Mr. STAGGERS).

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

THE 25TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare is this year celebrating its 25th birthday.

Mr. Speaker, during almost 20 of the 25 years the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare has been in existence, I have served on committees in the House that deal most directly with its programs. I was, therefore, pleased to have been invited by Secretary Joseph Califano to join in ceremonies on May 23 commemorating the Department's 25 years of service to the people of this Nation.

For the benefit of my colleagues who were unable to attend the celebration, I would like to share with them the following transcript of HEW's 25th anniversary ceremonies and the remarks on May 23 of Secretary Califano and friends of the Department.

OPENING CEREMONY AND PRESENTATION BY THE HONORABLE JOSEPH CALIFANO AT THE 25TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION AND WELFARE

PROCEEDINGS

(Music.)

Secretary Califano: Thank you. Please be seated. The dancers that signed the National Anthem while the band was playing it are from Gallaudet College, which is a college supported by this Department.

This celebration is, among other things, a family reunion for this Department. So many people are here from the Congress, many from other agencies, and from past careers in the history of HEW. Time permits me to introduce only those on the platform and I hope I don't miss any. But I want to welcome and thank all of you who have added to this celebration by joining us today. I will not follow protocol in introducing our guests, but I will mention first, and ask to stand, a person who is special to all of us. She is here in her capacity as the Junior Senator from Minnesota, but she is also here because she calls to mind the gallant, joyful, dedicated, very, very special man in whose honor the Congress of the United States named this building.

Together, Hubert and Muriel Humphrey made their lives and their career in public service a memorable celebration of two people. Ladies and gentlemen, Senator Muriel Humphrey.

(Applause.)

No family reunion would be complete without ancestors or founding fathers and mothers. We have them in abundance, several former Secretaries of HEW and as a current Secretary of HEW, it's always heartening to see healthy, agile former Secretaries of HEW. I will name them and ask them to stand in the order of their service here.

Arthur Flemming——

who, among other things, I might note was forced to withhold cranberries at Thanksgiving time. Some of you may recall. There are these little marks that each Secretary bears forever.

(Laughter.)

Abraham Ribicoff——

who led this Department in the days of the new frontier and who, I must say, only last week, once again demonstrated something I've known and witnessed in private situations for many years—an extraordinary amount of courage and dedication to the interests of this country, regardless of personal cost. Abe? (Inaudible).

(Applause.)

Anthony Celebrezze, Judge Celebrezze.

(Applause.)

Secretary Celebrezze got Medicaid and Medicare passed and then got out of the Department and onto the Federal Bench.

(Laughter.)

John Gardner, who will speak, but who might stand now for a moment.

(Applause.)

I'll say something about Secretary Gardner in a moment.

Wilbur Cohen——

who, as much as any man or woman, has his life in this Department and who retired from teaching this year only to accept, at President Carter's request, the Chairmanship of the White House Conference on the Family, which will be held next year.

And David Mathews.

(Applause.)

I have often been credited with starting a program to find and then fund the training of excellent minority candidates for postgraduate degrees in those areas—physics, and what have you—where we sorely lack minorities. I think I can take this opportunity to set the record straight and note that when Secretary Mathews was here and before I assumed office, the one thing he asked was that I continue and bring to completion the program that he had begun. That was his program.

(Applause.)

We have from the Cabinet, Secretary Andrus of Interior and Secretary Marshall from Labor and—— as we approach the setting of budget targets for fiscal 1980, I would like a big round of applause for OMB Director McIntyre.

(Applause.)

Jim McIntyre has unquestionably the worst job in the federal government. He's the one person that virtually never gets a chance to say "yes" and almost always has to say "no." He does it well and fairly. "And frequently," he says.

(Laughter.)

Or Secretary Marshall said "frequently." This Department itself would not be possible without the people I introduce next, some of whom were here and voted for the act and fought for the legislation that established this Department. From the Senate, in addition to Mrs. Humphrey, Senator Brooke,——

(Applause.)

Senator Jacob Javits,——

(Applause.)

Senator Jennings Randolph,——

(Applause.)

I will introduce Senator Magnuson in a moment. And from the House of Representatives, Congressman Jim Corman——

(Applause.)

Congressman Ford,——

(Applause.)

Chairman Pepper,——

(Applause.)

Chairman Carl Perkins, who is one of those who was here at the beginning and——

(Applause.)

Congressman Scheuer,——

(Applause.)

Chairman Staggers, who is an old and dear friend of mine,——

(Applause.)

And Congressman Pickle, who worked with Lyndon Johnson so hard to put so many of the programs in this Department.

(Applause.)

I'll introduce Congressman Brademas in a moment.

We also have, in the spirit of Camp David and to keep us honest, Jack Watson of the White House staff.

(Applause.)

His colleagues in the ranks of former Secretaries asked John Gardner to represent them and say just a few words. The ceremony will be very brief because many of these Committee Chairmen must get back to Capitol Hill. I must say, John Gardner is as fine a person as I have ever come across in public and private life and he's chosen to take on some of the most difficult and intractable problems, even after he left as Secretary of HEW.

So it's a special pleasure to introduce him to speak for the former Secretaries. John?

Secretary Gardner: Thank you very much. I speak for one of the most rampantly growing organizations in the country, the Association of Former Secretaries of HEW.

(Laughter.)

Familiarly known as AFSHEW. So far, my good friend, Secretary Califano, has shown no inclination to join our ranks, but based on long experience, we always keep a light in the window.

(Laughter.)

Obviously, I can't speak for a group so diverse as the former Secretaries. So I will speak for myself and hope that I'm reflecting the views of most of them. I loved HEW. Might as well admit it. I loved the people in HEW, not every last one of them, but far more than I would have thought possible.

(Laughter.)

I loved the mission of HEW and I want to repeat here what I said in my final report as Secretary. The mission is to strive toward the elimination of all the conditions that stunt individual growth or impair human dignity. It is to foster the strengths and capabilities that enable individuals to function as free and responsible citizens. It is to create the institutional arrrangements that enable individuals to have greater freedom of choice and I do believe that all of my fellow Secretaries, former Secretaries, would subscribe to that mission.

In pursuit of that mission, Congress and the American people have handed this Department many immensely difficult tasks, some of them almost impossible. To say that the Department has always succeeded would go far beyond even the permissible exaggerations of an anniversary, but to say that the people of HEW have accepted the immense tasks handed them by Congress and the American people and have tackled those tasks with admirable vigor and spirit and faithfulness is just the plain truth.

Mr. Secretary, I congratulate you on behalf of all the former Secretaries, congratulate you and the Department on this anniversary and I pray that you personally will receive from all quarters the support you need to accomplish your difficult mission.

Thank you very much.

(Applause.)

Secretary Califano: Now I would like to ask Senator Magnuson, who chairs our Appropriations Committee in the Senate, and who has worked hard to fund so many of these programs over so many years and who was here at the creation, if he would say a few words on behalf of the Senate.

(Applause.)

Senator Magnuson: Thank you. Mr. Secretary, Mrs. Humphrey, former Secretaries and my colleagues in Congress that are here today, ladies and gentlemen. There are many of us, Mr. Secretary, that have been here since the beginning and watched this organization grow. We started out very small. But it's no wonder that you have the big complex organization you have now, that must be administered by, as well as possible, by the Secretaries and you people who work for HEW, because since the beginning, tremendous responsibility has been placed upon this Department and it comes very fast. Much of it from the courts of the United States and a lot of it from the Congress of the United States.

Put the two together and you have an organization that's not only the largest in the government—I asked the Secretary one time, when he first took office, how many people are employed in HEW. How many people are paid out of the federal till? Well, it was a little difficult to get that figure. Finally, he came up with it. HEW now employs 1,144,000 people. That's bigger than the Army, I think, or the Navy. But I'm not critical of it and we in Congress are not critical of it, because we know that you have become the peoples' agency and therefore, with the growth of the country and the recognition up on the Hill and by various administrations of the so-called legitimate social needs of the people of this country, it's no wonder that you have to have so many people to do it and do the job.

Now it's nice of you to ask us here today, Mr. Secretary. I often thought that within any organization such as this that it's awfully nice to have your banker up for coffee and doughnuts once in a while.

(Laughter.)

But this is a job for all of Congress and we wish you well. You're a sensitive agency and there surely must be some anxiety within many of you here today as looking toward the future and the responsibilities you'll have, as this country shifts its philosophy, political and otherwise, for the great social needs of the American people.

So I congratulate you on your 25th birthday. All of us in Congress are going to be as helpful as we can that you might continue to do the job you've done in the first 25 years.

Thank you very much.

(Applause.)

Secretary Califano: And, for the House of Representatives, Congressman John Brademas, one of the leaders of the House, a long-time personal social friend of mine, but most importantly, I think, for this morning, a long-time friend of the people this Department serves and many of the programs of this Department.

John?

(Applause.)

Congressman Brademas: Thank you very much. Mr. Secretary, distinguished former Secretaries, Mrs. Humphrey, my other colleagues in Congress, members of the Cabinet and friends. I have had the privilege for nearly 20 years now of serving on one of the several committees of the House of Representatives with which the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, with its manifold responsibilities, deals. So I can speak from first-hand experience when I join all of you in this celebration of the 25th anniversary of the Department.

There is no department of the federal government that touches more directly or more broadly on the lives of such a diversity of people as does the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. It is therefore appropriate, as Secretary Califano has already observed, that we think of today as a celebration of people, people ranging from preschool children receiving the benefits of Head Start, to older Americans receiving a social security check, to handicapped persons receiving the advantages of rehabilitation services. I am especially pleased to see here so many distinguished former Secretaries of the Department, for they form a noble line of persons committed to the celebration of people.

I know from many years of friendship with Secretary Califano that this marks his commitment as well and because Joe Califano is there, the commitment of President Carter, too. So, Mr. Secretary, on behalf of Speaker O'Neill and Majority Leader Wright and the entire membership of the House of Representatives, I join you in congratulating you on this joyous occasion.

Thank you very much.

(Applause.)

Secretary Califano: I would like to say a few words on this occasion, as words I speak as an employee of HEW to the Congress and to the American people. "The moral test of government is how that government treats those in the dawn of life, its children, those who are in the twilight of life, its elderly, and those who are in the shadows of life, the sick, the needy and the handicapped." In those words, on a day last November, when we dedicated this building to him, Hubert Humphrey expressed a part of his philosophy and he summed up eloquently the mission of this Department.

For this Department, through 25 turbulent years, has devoted itself to helping the most vulnerable of our nation's people, those who are very young or are very old, those who are sick or poor or handicapped. We are the agency through which this government and the Congress has sought to meet and measure up to that exacting moral test of Hubert Humphrey, to hold a light aloft for those who live in the twilight, or in the shadows.

This Department represents the greatest act of compassion of any society in the history of civilization. What can we learn from its 25 years of effort and struggle? For me, there are three conclusions to be drawn and the first of them is this—the efforts of government to deal with social problems, to affect major social change, can be successful and sometimes spectacularly successful. Consider these bits of evidence. Between 1965 and 1975, the number of American people living in poverty was reduced by half, from 30 million people to 15 million people, from 15 percent of our population to seven percent of our population. That is an achievement every bit as exciting as landing a man on the moon and it happened, in large part, because of the programs of this Department.

(Applause.)

In only ten years, the proportion of young black Americans entering college has doubled. Today, a high school graduate who is black has almost the same chance to go to college as his white classmate. That, too, is a striking social achievement and it happened in large part because of this Department.

(Applause.)

Its programs of Equal Opportunity, of educational enrichment and student financial aid.

Life expectancy in America has grown in the past few years and infant mortality has declined, largely because of programs administered by this Department. Medicare and Medicaid, programs of maternal and child health, programs of scientific and biomedical research.

It is a measure of our standards as a nation that when such things happen, we quickly take them for granted. We Americans accept as routine, advances that other ages and other nations would hail as revolutionary. In an age of deep pessimism about the capacity of government to do almost anything right, such achievements come as rays of light. They are not reasons for government to congratulate itself. They are reasons for the American people to congratulate themselves.

Such achievements are signs of our national vitality. They are signs that our nation is not only coping with its problems, but often overcoming them. That in itself is cause for celebration. The daily work of this Department may seem prosaic—writing regulations, dispensing federal funds, mailing out forms, gathering statistics, making research grants, mailing social security checks. The results are anything but prosaic. They are breathtaking diversity and profound impact. We measure them, not just in budgets and organization charts, but in other ways—in the delight of a child watching Sesame Street, in our pride when a scientist at HEW, the National Institutes of Health, wins the Nobel Prize. In every hard-won victory of a handicapped person or a retarded child against enormous odds and in the smile of an older American, enjoying the food and companionship at a senior citizen center.

I think it is entirely fitting, after 25 years, for the American people to remind themselves of these successes and for us to rejoice in them.

The second lesson of these years has to do with the omnipresence of controversy. This Department was born in controversy, has lived amid controversy and will probably celebrate its 50th anniversary in the midst of controversy and that is as it should be.

For HEW, after all, as Senator Ribicoff has noted, pricks our national conscience. It touches on those sensitive national nerves. We are not only the largest government Department, we also deal with the largest issues. We confront a tangle of social problems which are difficult to define, much less solve—discrimination, poverty, medical ethics. We are charged by law to deal with human difficulties that other institutions in our society, the family, the schools, the national economy, have failed to solve and we deal with these problems in the open. We must accommodate somehow all the competing and contending views of this diverse, contrary nation. We extend ourselves to serve the interests of young and old, black and white, Hispanic, Eskimo, Indian, women and handicapped citizens.

But the controversies are a feature of life in this Department. They are also a blessing, however mixed, for they are the debates of a lively democracy, the earnest discussions of a people who care, not only care, but care passionately. I believe quite simply that the crosswinds of opinion and controversy that blow constantly through this Department blow not ill, but good for America. They do not chill our national life. They invigorate and refresh our democracy.

I would draw finally a third lesson, a lesson about the virtues of efficiency. This Department has grown phenomenally since it was founded. In 1953, its total budget was less than $7 billion. Next year, its budget will reach $182 billion, a 26-fold increase in 25 short years.

In 1954, we were 35,000 federal employees. Today, we are 145,000 federal employees and we pay the salaries of another 980,000 state, local and private employees. That growth, thrust upon us by the Congress and the American people, has created a more just and caring society. But that growth has also come sometimes at the expense of efficiency.

For years, the foremost challenge that faced us was to tackle the unfinished business of a generation, to launch compassionate new programs, to address problems the nation had not faced, much less solved. Today, our challenge is no less awesome, not only to meet the needs of our people for social justice, but to answer to another demand of the American people. Their demand for carefully, prudently-managed government. Ours is the challenge of expressing compassion, but compassion disciplined by competence. We must be as wise and as effective as we are caring.

Nothing less will work today in a time of limited resources. Nothing else will do if we are to restore peoples' confidence in the ability of their government to do something.

That is why HEW has recently embarked upon an historic effort to increase the efficiency of its programs, to root out fraud and abuse, to streamline the machinery of this Department. Without these efforts, our compassion would be flabby, sentimental—an aimless thing. We would be like a physician overflowing with sympathy for his patients, but lacking the skill or the medicines to cure them or treat them.

I believe that I speak for every past Secretary of this Department and for all the devoted people who serve in this Department when I say that these three things—the satisfaction of great achievement, the excitement of great controversy and the unending challenge to do better—are the things that make this Department the most exciting and invigorating and rewarding of all government departments—federal, state or local.

I would rather be here and the employees of this Department would rather be here at this moment in history than any other place in the public service, here in the Department of the people.

(Applause.)

Today, to the American people and to the members of the Congress whose stewards we are, I bring a pledge from the people of HEW. We are determined to build on the achievements of 25 years. We are determined to emerge from the controversies of today with policies that serve all the people of this varied and vital land. We are determined to do good and to do it well. As we seek to do these things, as we seek to meet the moral test that Hubert Humphrey set forth and that he met so well in his own life, we can profit by the words of two other national leaders.

One is Lyndon Johnson. More than any other President before him, he shaped the missions and programs of this Department. One must recognize that before he became President, there was no Medicare, there was no Medicaid, there was no federal aid for education, there were no cancer and heart and stroke programs. There were no poverty programs. There was no Head Start program. There were very few of the programs that are here in this Department today. Lyndon Johnson once described his vision for America this way.

"The great society is not a safe harbor, a resting place, a final objective, a finished work. It is a challenge. Constantly renewed, beckoning us toward a destiny where the meaning of our lives matches the marvelous products of our labor." Yesterday in a telegram concerning this anniversary Lady Bird Johnson recalled some other words of his that describe our nation and I believe this Department.

"Always be coming, trying, probing, falling, resting and trying again. But always trying and always gaining."

The other words are from another President who today challenges us with a simple insistent question. "Why not the best?" How well we answer President Carter's question will shape the next 25 years of this Department and of much of this nation.

We are looking forward to answering that question well.

Thank you.

(Applause.)

(End of proceedings as recorded.) ●

NEEDLESS SLIGHT TO TAIWAN

(Mr. SIKES asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this ponit in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, it escaped the attention of most Americans that we did not have an official representative of stature at the inauguration of the President of the Republic of China on Taiwan. Assuredly, it did not escape the attention of Asiatics throughout the area. Most countries of the world knew that our Mr. Brzezinski, one of the President's top men on foreign affairs, was at that time a visitor in Red China. Whether or not this was a deliberate slight to Taiwan, the Asiatics will consider it so. It is unfortunate that the administration is not more careful in its dealings with foreigners.

Taiwan and Korea are the only effectively armed anti-Communist countries in Asia. There are those who are pressing hard to get us out of both. Without American support, the survival of either as free enterprise nations is doubtful. When U.S. support is lacking for Taiwan and South Korea, we push Japan toward the waiting arms of the Communists.

Japan has no defense worthy of the name. We provide Japan's defense. This is a drain on the American taxpayer. It also permits Japan, without realistic military expenditures, to manufacture goods at less cost for sale in competition with American goods, but that is another subject. If Japan, Taiwan, and South Korea are nudged or pushed into the Communist orbit, the remaining non-Communist people of Asia will speedily follow suit.

Failure to have a high-ranking delegation in Taiwan could not have been something that simply was overlooked. If deliberate, it was a mistake and a needless affront to a good friend and a staunch ally.

It is difficult to understand the emphasis which is apparently being given to the People's Republic of China by this administration. We all realize that it is a nation of 800 million people, but one which has harnessed its entire populace primarily to the task of providing enough food and clothing for their own requirements. Their first concern is to avoid conflict with the Soviets while pushing for leadership among world Communist nations. Additionally, their position on Taiwan is well known. They demand that we drop our relations with the Nationalist Chinese before upgrading our relations with them. Yet, diplomatic relations with them offers little to our Nation.

Once again, however, we have pulled the rug from another ally. Instead of support for a friend, we have another administration representative, hat in hand, attempting to acceed to the unconscionable demands of a dedicated foe. History teaches us that endeavors such as this lose us allies, and make no new ones. When will we learn? ●

AMERICA HAS NO BASES IN AFRICA

(Mr. SIKES asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, the question of American assistance to beleaguered African countries under pressure from the Russian-Cuban terrorists combination generally overlooks one important factor. The United States now has no bases in Africa. One by one, we have been thrown out or we withdrew, and in most instances it was because a Marxist regime had taken control. The Russians have a chain of major bases scattered throughout the continent of Africa. As an illustration, Wheelus Air Base in Libya, once a very important U.S. training base, now serves as a principal port of entry for Russian weapons being shipped by air to implement Russian-Cuban aims in African nations. The question of lack of bases is equally applicable where U.S. rescue or support missions are concerned. This problem is discussed in knowledgeable terms in the Annapolis Evening Capital of May 19, 1978, under the title, "Lack of Bases Causes Problem." I submit it for reprinting in the RECORD:●

LACK OF BASES CAUSES PROBLEM

WASHINGTON.—A senior U.S. military official says a minor rescue operation in Africa would present "complex problems" and that a major U.S. military operation now on the vast continent would be out of the question because of the lack of U.S. bases there.

As the official, who asked to remain anonymous, put it recently:

"There are not a very large number of circumstances or a very likely set of circumstances in which U.S. forces in Africa would be appropriate or even feasible."

As for U.S. ability to mount a major operation in Africa, military planners point out that there are few, if any, bases that would be available to support American forces in the continent.

The official said others in the Carter administration share his view. He indicated he believes congressional and public opinion would oppose any U.S. military involvement in Africa.

The United States once occupied a string of bases across North Africa, but they were given up in the 1960s. Ethiopia once was one of this country's few strong friends in Africa, but a Marxist military regime threw out the last American military presence there in 1977.

The senior defense official acknowledged it could be a difficult maneuver to carry out even a relatively small rescue expedition to Zaire by a force of some 1,500 paratroopers flown across the Atlantic in U.S. transport planes. The armed expedition was a possibility earlier this week, before most American civilians escaped from Kolwezi, a city under rebel attack.

It is still possible for the United States to stage "a show of military capability when it is appropriate," the official said.

He recalled that the nuclear-powered aircraft carrier Enterprise was moved close to the East African coast early last year when Ugandan President Idi Amin threatened Americans in his country.

Amin then disclaimed any intent to harm the Americans. It has never been established that he reversed himself because the Enterprise was at the ready hundreds of miles away from his landlocked country.

In any event, the presence of the Enterprise in those waters was a happy coincidence for the United States. U.S. warships make periodic voyages into the Indian Ocean to show the flag, but they are not there at all times.

Commenting on the administration's apparent frustration in trying to find a formula to discourage Soviet and Cuban military involvement in Africa, the senior official said, "We clearly have not found the solution."

He said there is "evidence that the Cubans are getting somewhat more brazen" in their African activities.

According to current estimates, there are about 40,000 Cuban military men and about 2,500 Russian advisers in 18 African countries. Most of the Cubans and Russians are in Angola and Ethiopia.

Speaking of the Russians and their deepening commitment in Africa, the defense official said "it is difficult to find signals that will get their attention and at the same time not upset negotiations that are going on."

Despite the administration's concern about the Cuban penetration in Africa, it is clear that President Carter does not intend to tie that problem to the U.S.-Soviet negotiations on limiting strategic nuclear weapons—the SALT talks.

The senior official conceded that the United States has only limited leverage to use against Russia in the economic field and no means for bringing direct pressure to bear on Cuba because the United States maintains no trade or formal diplomatic relations with Fidel Castro's government.

However, the official said there are ways in which the United States has acted to get its message of disapproval across on the African question.

He said the United States had put on the backburner negotiations sought by the Russians to neutralize the Indian Ocean area militarily, and that the Russians knew that this was caused by U.S. displeasure over their African intentions.●

SMALL ISSUE INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BONDS

(Mr. COTTER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. COTTER. Mr. Speaker, one of the important aspects of President Carter's urban package is the additional 5 percent investment tax credit and the higher ceiling for tax-free industrial revenue bonds for "economically distressed areas." While each Member has a different view of the substantive aspects of these proposals, many find the idea of targeting Federal tax incentives both novel and worthwhile.

I along with other Members have been working to secure detailed information about what areas qualify for the designation "economically distressed." The administration has just provided me with a complete nationwide breakdown. Therefore, for the benefit of all Members of Congress and other interested individuals, I am enclosing the complete nationwide list developed by the Treasury Department. This list is not definitive. I realize that the Congress will make changes it thinks necessary to help revitalize economically distressed areas in our Nation, but the Carter proposal provides a good beginning.

The information follows:

FACT SHEET

SMALL ISSUE INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BONDS

The President's proposal

The size of projects which may be financed with tax exempt "small issues" of industrial development bonds will be increased from a maximum of $5 million to $20 million, but the tax exemption will be allowed only for acquisition or construction of land or depreciable property in "distressed" areas.

The test for economic distress will be applied to areas defined by either: 1) the boundaries of any city, town or other unit of general purpose government or 2) the area within a county's boundaries outside of all general purpose units of local government.

Local area eligibility will be defined separately for two groups: local areas with boundaries in whole or in part within an SMSA and local areas wholly outside of SMSAs. An area will be eligible if it meets at least three of four criteria relative to all local areas within its group: i) its local unemployment rate is above the average, ii) its five-year growth rate of employment is below the average, iii) its five-year growth rate of population is below the average, and iv) its five-year absolute change in per-capita income is below the average.

Present law

Industrial development bonds are securities issued by State and local governments for the benefit of private borrowers. One of the cases for which interest on such bonds is tax-exempt is for small issues, where the amount of the bonds sold does not exceed $1 million or the total capital expenses on the facility being financed do not exceed $5 million.

LIST OF ELIGIBLE JURISDICTIONS FOR THE INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BOND AND DIFFERENTIAL INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT PROVISIONS OF THE ADMINISTRATION'S URBAN PROGRAM

The accompanying list indicates the areas of the country which satisfy the distress test for eligibility under the Industrial Development Bond and Differential Investment Tax Credit provisions of the Administration's Urban Program. For towns, cities, and townships shown in the list, the eligible area is defined by the boundaries of the local jurisdiction. In the case of counties, the eligible area refers to that portion of the county outside of incorporated or organized jurisdictions.

The key to the state codes in the list of eligible areas is as follows:

01 Alabama	26 Missouri
02 Alaska	27 Montana
03 Arizona	28 Nebraska
04 Arkansas	29 Nevada
05 California	30 New Hampshire

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

THE DISCOVER AMERICA INTERNATIONAL POW WOW

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, the Ninth Annual Discover America International Pow Wow held in St. Louis last September attracted more than 400 travel experts from some 60 foreign countries and the interest it aroused throughout the world resulted in an estimated $100 million in travel business for the United States.

This international event was organized by DATO—Discover America Travel Organization—with the support of 288 U.S. firms which supplied "Discover America—Visit U.S.A." Travel accommodations, goods, and services to help further the growth and improvement of tourism in this country.

A highlight of the September meeting was an address by F. C. "Bud" Wiser, former president of Pan Am which I should like to include in the RECORD for the benefit of all Members of the House and their constituents who may be less than fully aware of the great tourism opportunities that exist within our own national borders. As chairman of the Aviation Subcommittee of the House Committee on Public Works and Transportation, I believe, too, that Mr. Wiser's comments will be of great value to the Members in considering the Air Service Improvement Act of 1978 which will be brought to the floor during this session.

Address follows:

DISCOVER AMERICA INTERNATIONAL POW WOW

Thank you for the invitation to join with you today.

It seems particularly appropriate that you are meeting this year in St. Louis, the city which had leaders foresighted enough to finance a young aviator's dream of conquering the North Atlantic, alone and nonstop, just 50 years ago.

Charles Lindbergh's flight was a notable human achievement. But its ramifications were far greater than one man's courageous act. The flight of the Spirit of St. Louis captured the world's imagination. People for the first time began to recognize the possibility of development of peaceful aviation. Public support and private capital became abundantly available.

The air age was born.

The seed of mass international tourism was planted.

Today, we have gathered from all over the world to generate tourism, specifically tourism to the United States, in the ongoing effort to introduce people of the world to our land and to guarantee that our product provides what it promises. And, I think it safe to say, to see to it that we all make a little money doing so.

The Discover America Travel Organizations, with the support of the United States Travel Service, are prime vehicles for fulfilling this mission. I would like to take this occasion to congratulate Fabian Chavez for his appointment as assistant secretary of commerce for tourism and to wish him and his associate Jeanne Westphal every success in carrying forward the work of the USTS.

The DATO Discover America International Pow Wows are the prime forum for continued stimulation of the VISIT USA program.

Pan Am, incidentally, worked closely with the Discover America International Committee in organizing and conducting the Brussels Mission to Europe in 1968 and has been an enthusiastic supporter of DATO from its inception.

Delegates at Brussels realized that organized, face-to-face communications between the suppliers of travel goods and services in the U.S. and international producers of tourism would be productive for all concerned from a business standpoint and for keeping the dialogue that had been opened going.

The first Pow Wow was held in New York in 1969, with 67 representatives from ten European countries meeting with 68 U.S. firms. The following year, Latin America was added to the network. The first world conference convened in Chicago in 1971.

Participation has increased rapidly. Bill Toohey tells me that this year he expects a total of 1,600 people to attend this ninth annual Pow Wow. They represent 60 countries and 288 firms occupying some 340 booths, along with other members of the travel community and foreign and U.S. press. Bill also reports that hundreds of millions of dollars of business have been initiated or transacted in your recent sessions compared with hundreds of thousands at the first Pow Wow.

It seems safe to conclude that the Brussels group seized upon an idea whose time had come and that operation of the Discover America International Pow Wow, with the constant cosponsorship and support of the USTS, has transformed this idea into a dynamic reality.

The Brussels Conference also set objectives that needed to be met if the United States was to realize its potential as a tourist attraction. Since then, considerable progress has been made toward achieving these goals.

The Brussels gathering identified specific concerns that Europeans had about visiting the United States—particularly concerns that tourists would not be welcome and that prices would be too high.

Since 1968, the U.S. has indeed become a more hospitable place to visit, as many of our guests have remarked, particularly on the occasion of the Bicentennial's Operation Sail.

Basically, we have finally admitted to ourselves that not everybody speaks our language and have taken steps to extend a more cordial welcome to our non-English-speaking visitors. Among the actions that come to mind are:

Multilingual college students provide language services at our major gateways;

Hotel chains have introduced language capability programs;

Multilingual signs have been installed at airports and in the national parks;

People who provide handling services have become more proficient in foreign languages;

More and more tours cater to one language group, and Travel experts who staff the toll-free Travelphone USA, a joint USTS, Travelodge and Pan Am venture, are equipped to answer, in seven languages, virtually any question a foreign visitor may have.

What has happened to prices the world over in the past nine years is no secret. However, it is encouraging to note that in an otherwise gloomy survey of the world economic scene, the International Monetary Fund recently reported that the United States is among the three nations which have done the best job of containing inflation. The other two, incidentally, are also travel-oriented countries—Germany and Japan.

The airlines have been in the forefront in the drive to restrain price increases, and the airlines have achieved this primarily through the continuing application of new technology.

Consider a few statistics. The U.S. consumer price index has risen 136 percent since 1948—U.S. airline air fares 27 percent. The consumer price index here has climbed 75 percent in the past ten years—international air fares 40 percent. The price of owning and operating an automobile has gone up 63 percent in the same period, the price of food 180 percent. In real terms, the price of scheduled airline service across the North Atlantic actually has decreased 44 percent since 1963.

Pan Am has long advocated the lowest possible economic fares, as the way to expand the market for international travel. It was Pan Am, in fact, which led an otherwise reluctant industry into transatlantic tourist fares in 1952. More recently, Pan Am has proposed budget fares for the Atlantic and supported reductions in APEX tariffs. As you know, the Civil Aeronautics Board scuttled the APEX filing for the Atlantic and directed us to up the price of the reserved-seat budget fare. We have done so and the fare was approved.

Both of these fares serve the objectives that Pan Am has been pursuing for a long time—using our scheduled services to offer the pleasure traveler low fares that simultaneously give us added revenues to hold down the level of fares for the business traveler. We shall continue to pursue these objectives.

Containment of price and development of new business has also been of concern to the U.S. domestic travel industry. Foreign visitors today have a wide variety of discounts available on domestic airlines, on Amtrak and on the bus lines.

European travel producers at Brussels stressed the need for higher commissions. The IATA airlines have since agreed to an increase in the basic point-to-point commission from seven to eight percent. Support of tour operators has also been greatly liberalized, with obviously positive results.

The efforts to attract foreign visitors, including those from Canada and Mexico, are paying off. In 1968, the U.S. hosted 12,000,000 visitors who spent $2 billion. Last year we entertained 17,454,000 foreign visitors who spent $5.8 billion in the U.S. and another $1 billion for U.S.-flag carrier service. Noted travel writer and consultant William D. Patterson notes that this makes "the United States the globe's Number 1 destination in terms of $6.8 billion earned from foreign tourism." The figures continue to climb; the USTS predicts there will be 18,600,000 foreign visitors this year, who will spend an estimated $7.4 billion.

As is typical of all highly developed countries, U.S. citizens continue to spend more abroad than we earn from foreigners. However, last year the travel deficit narrowed to $2.7 billion from $3.1 billion in 1975; this was the smallest deficit since 1970.

Statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor will be identified by the use of a "bullet" symbol, i.e., ●

The number of overseas visitors also continues to grow. In 1968 there were 1,800,000, and they spent $640,000,000. Last year there were 4,500,000, a 20 percent increase over 1975. These people spent $2.4 billion, a 30 percent increase over the previous year.

DATO and the USTS are to be congratulated on their role in this accomplishment. So is the travel agent/tour operator industry, whose impact is indicated by the fact that in 1976 travel agency sales in the U.S. alone were nearly $15 billion. We know from our own experience the crucial role agents play in our business. This was underscored by a recent survey of Canadian vacation travel patterns. In 1976, 20 percent of the people planning trips consulted an agent, up from seven percent in 1970. Seventy-three percent of those planning an overseas trip and 83 percent of those buying a package tour took advantage of the services travel agents provide.

The USTS also deserves high marks for its efforts in promoting international tourism and in making visitors more welcome. We strongly support the USTS in its campaign to increase its budget, and we would urge that additional monies be channeled into increased advertising and promotion and into opening more offices abroad in the most promising markets.

While today's numbers are impressive, the United States is now only on the verge of establishing a mass market for tourism, particularly from abroad. I submit that now is the time for the U.S. travel industry, working through DATO, to set new objectives and develop new programs.

Various new approaches have been suggested, and I trust that they will be the subject of lively discussion here this week. Some possibilities the industry might want to consider include:

Discover America/VISIT USA weeks to bring together travel suppliers and producers could be organized in specific markets;

Travel showcases featuring travel industry exhibits that bring the product to the trade and consumer market could be developed for regions, states and cities;

The Pow Wow approach could be adopted to stimulate convention business through introducing meeting organizers to U.S. sites and facilities;

Better information systems could lead to greater attendance at conventions and trade shows and fairs in the U.S.;

Perhaps most importantly, DATO chapters could be established in other countries around the world to maintain constant VISIT USA efforts.

I have probably just scratched the surface. But let us begin to expand our thinking. We at Pan Am stand ready and eager to participate indeveloping new ideas and implementing new programs.

Over the years the airlines have played three major roles in the development of the tourist industry: enhancement of the quality of life, creation of jobs, and development of technology to bring fares within the reach of the average person.

The social and educational values of travel have been known, albeit dimly, perhaps since the first prehistoric man wondered what was to be found outside his own valley and climbed the hill to look. In the Book of Daniel we read, "many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased."

During the last quarter of this century, international travel will enrich life on a scale never before possible. The tourist industry is the largest quality-of-life enhancer the world has ever seen.

Major responsibilities in the development of this phenomenon has fallen on the world's airlines, for they have used technology to conquer the obstacles of distance and of price. However, while airlines make it possible for the average man and woman to travel between continents, airlines do not compel them to do so. Airlines are the method, not the motive.

Futurologist Herman Kahn recently wrote: "People seem to have an almost insatiable deside to travel; and for increasing numbers the money and time available for travel have been growing, while the facilities for traveling have become more convenient and less expensive."

T. A. Wilson, chairman of the Boeing Company, has stated: "Until recent times most of us relied on explorers, missionaries, military personnel or news media representatives to make the unfamiliar portion of our world more familiar. Air travel now provides the means for all to participate directly in the process. In effect, what Marco Polo did in 1272 A.D., thousands now do daily. Before the end of this century, the number will increase to millions."

All this activity creates jobs. The IATA member airlines employ some 840,000. But this is just the nucleus. All airlines must buy supplies ranging from paper napkins to aircraft. All airlines must rely on the travel services and support industries.

No one has ever added up worldwide totals. However, we have some indicative samples. For instance, the sales volume of U.S.-built widebodies—the 747's, DC–10's and 1011's—has amounted to $15.5 billion to date. Of that sum, about $9 billion represents payroll. The U.S. Department of Commerce has calculated that for each $1 of sales of completed aircraft, $2.19 is generated in sales for all the companies that supply its component parts.

DATO estimates that travel in the U.S. generates 3,800,000 jobs directly, with payroll of $22 billion and an additional 2,000,000 indirectly. Employment in the travel industry over the past two decades has grown more than twice as fast as overall nonagricultural employment, and has proved remarkably recession-proof.

Travel industry jobs depend on economic air transport and economic air transport depends, in turn, on aeronautical technology and airline efficiency.

The purpose of improved aeronautical technology, in terms of airline goals, is to provide superior economic performance as well as superior technical performance. Thus, the first long-range jets offered economic performance far superior to the piston-engined airliners they replaced. In turn, the wide-body 747 provided even better economics.

When the 747 went into service in 1970, its direct operating costs were about one-third of those of the piston-engined airplanes in service 20 years earlier—and about half those of the 707. The 747 engine is about 30 percent more fuel efficient than the original 707 engine, and the 747 overall is just about three times as productive as the most efficient 707.

Figures like those explain why the rate of increase in air fares has been less than the rate of increase in the price of most goods and services. Also that relatively low rate of increase helps to explain why air travel, domestic and international, has grown so rapidly.

The world airlines as a group recently entered a new era. The petroleum crisis dealt them a grievous blow from which they have not recovered. More than ever, they need to acquire improved technology in order to offset higher costs. Short term, they need to replace obsolescent airliners with more efficient modern ones. Long term, they need to be able to acquire advanced technology that is on the shelf but not yet embodied in airliners—airliners that will be as great an improvement over the 747 as the 747 was over the 707.

Let me reemphasize that the ability to buy new technology has been a principal factor in keeping fares down. It will be a principal factor for the future. The purchase of new technology must be financed either by taxes or by airline earnings. The preferable way is earnings. The consumer of air transportation and the supplier of transportation services have a stake in air line earnings high enough to improve service and to contain fare increases.

That is tomorrow's challenge.

Today's challenge is to expand tourism to help generate earnings to meet tomorrow's needs.

That's what the Pow Wow is all about and I wish you the most successful Pow Wow yet.

I am sure that Charles Lindbergh would have applauded your activities. He was a lifelong apostle of the peaceful uses of aviation to promote world commerce and understanding among all the peoples of the world.●

NATIONAL SECURITY AND WORLD PEACE

Hon. Theodore M. (Ted) Risenhoover

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. RISENHOOVER. Mr. Speaker, I have today received a letter—like perhaps several of my colleagues—from five former Supreme Allied Commanders of NATO. It is a very ominous and important message concerning our national security and world peace.

I am on the record voting for the removal of the embargo on arms for Turkey and, after reading this letter, I hope that my colleagues will share in this view.

I include this letter in the RECORD:

WASHINGTON, D.C.
June 1, 1978.

Hon. TED RISENHOOVER,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN RISENHOOVER: As former Supreme Allied Commanders of the North Atlantic Alliance, we are deeply concerned by the damaging consequences of the U.S. arms embargo on Turkey for United States and NATO security. We view with alarm the deterioration in NATO's southern flank caused by the sharp decline in Turkish military capabilities and the increasing alienation of Turkey from the United States. Should Turkey, as a result of the embargo, turn away from this country and reduce or terminate its commitment to NATO, the whole of Southeastern Europe and the Middle East would become more vulnerable to Soviet military pressure.

Turkey is vitally important to our Western collective security in that it (1) controls the passage of Soviet war vessels from the Black Sea to the Mediterranean; (2) houses large numbers of strategically important U.S. and NATO facilities, some of which are uniquely situated for collecting intelligence on Soviet military activities; (3) provides an air defense warning critical to the operation of our Sixth Fleet in the Mediterranean; and (4) provides a major contribution of army forces to NATO. The continued adherence of Turkey to the West is particularly important to Greece. If Turkey were detached from NATO, Greece would be surrounded by neutral and Communist states and would be less able to deter or prevent Soviet political or military advances.

It is imperative, therefore, to stimulate a resolution of the differences between our two Eastern Mediterranean allies, Greece and Turkey, and to promote a just and humane Cyprus settlement in a way that does not undermine U.S. and NATO security. Our need for our Western defensive alliance is now greater than ever in light of the ominous Soviet military build-up in Europe of recent years. We, therefore, strongly support the lifting of the embargo on arms for Turkey.

Sincerely,

ANDREW J. GOODPASTER,
LYMAN L. LEMNITZER,
LAURIS NORSTAD,
ALFRED M. GRUENTHER,
MATTHEW B. RIDGWAY.●

MARIO BIAGGI SPEAKS OUT FOR RULE OF LAW IN CYPRUS

HON. LESTER L. WOLFF

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Speaker, I and a number of my colleagues in the House are most concerned by the administration's proposal to lift the congressionally imposed arms embargo against Turkey. The actions of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee opposing this action was an important step but the issue is by no means resolved.

On April 16, in an impressive and impassioned demonstration some 10,000 to 15,000 Greek-Americans gathered in Lafayette Park to protest the lifting of the embargo and calling for adherence to the rule of law in Cyprus.

A featured speaker at the rally was my colleague MARIO BIAGGI from New York, one of the staunchest supporters of the arms embargo and responsible for the amendment to the Foreign Assistance Act of 1974 which provided the first U.S. commitment of funds for rehabilitation aid to Cyprus. His statement provides a clear perspective of the issues involved and deserves the close attention of my colleagues.

Mr. BIAGGI's statement follows:

STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE MARIO BIAGGI—APRIL 16, 1978

It was almost four years ago when Turkey, in an act of immoral and illegal aggression invaded Cyprus. To this day Turkey continues to occupy more than 40 percent of Cyprus and control a much higher percentage of its key industries. Three years ago, the United States Congress in response to these ruthless actions voted to impose an embargo on further U.S. military arms and assistance to Turkey for it was some of this aid which was used to invade Cyprus. I was proud to have been one of the main advocates of the legislation and felt it demonstrated to the world the Congress' belief in the rule of law.

This Administration has proposed a lifting of the arms embargo due to fear that Turkey will make good on her threat to close all U.S. military bases. Yet the fact is the illegality and immorality which prompted the arms embargo has not diminished. Turkey continues to illegally control a sizable portion of Cyprus. Human rights violations are continuing—thousands of Greek Cypriots remain refugees on their home land living lives of despair—some 2000 Greek Cypriots remain missing having been that way since the invasion. Yet the United States, the new champion of human rights has chosen to overlook this situation and instead take an action which will have the effect of sanctioning the status quo on Cyprus.

The question of human rights on Cyprus is of deep concern to me. A recent communication to the United Nations by Mr. Joseph J. Stephanides, Charge d'Affairs of the Permanent Mission of Cyprus to the United Nations portrayed graphically the extent to which human rights of violations exist in Cyprus. Mr. Stephanides stated "the living conditions of the enclaved Greek Cypriot inhabitants in the areas of the Republic under Turkey's military occupation have recently become unbearable as a result of unthinkable inhuman practices which they systematically employ . . . These are medieval conditions of horror, torture and continuous harassment." Mr. Stephanides appealed to the world community when he states, "There can hardly be any justification for inaction and apathy of the face of the impartially documented and internationally verified gross violations of fundamental human rights by the Turkish arm of occupation against the people of Cyprus as a whole."

Turkey, if in good faith could have sought a resolution of this unlawful occupation and its consequences. They have had four years to demonstrate their good faith. In the continuing absence of such a commitment and the continuing presence of human rights violations it is intolerable that this Administration would even suggest a change in the embargo.

To lift the embargo at this time would thwart the will of the people as expressed by the Congress. It would endanger our favorable relations with the people of Cyprus and Greece. Can we not expect their friendship to turn to hostility because of our abandonment and betrayal?

America's credibility is at stake. We must insist that Turkey show its good faith by negotiating a lasting peace on Cyprus including a reunification for those thousands of Greek Cypriots who are refugees on their own land and a full accounting of all missing Greek Cypriots.

The role America plays with respect to Cyprus will be a barometer which other nations will use to gauge the integrity and viability of our foreign policy. Our respect for the rule of law must not waiver. Our insistence of respect for human rights cannot be compromised. Our pursuit of a lasting and just peace on Cyprus must continue.●

JOYCE HARRISON PARK

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I request permission to include in the RECORD the following poem written by Ms. Marie Cunningham Brown, an outstanding member of the staff of the House Select Committee on Aging, in which she expressed her pride in the successful struggle of her sister, Ms. Joyce Harrison Park, to become the first professional member of her family. Ms. Park will graduate on Friday, June 2, 1978, from the School of Dentistry of the Baltimore College of Dental Surgery of the University of Maryland at Baltimore. I believe all who read this RECORD will be warmed by the pride and love expressed in this poem:

JOYCE HARRISON PARK

(By Marie Cunningham Brown)

The happiness of the moment is evident through the radiance of your smile.
The pride we feel is evident, too, we want the moment to last a while.
Memories of long ago begin to cross my mind.
I wondered then, what would be for you with the passage of years and time.
For you were only two when Mama died and couldn't understand why we cried as we held you close to us.

We knew the years ahead would be difficult and hard to tread. Our words were all that we had to give you. I believe you remembered most of what we said.

We promised you our love and encouraged you to live your life to the fullest.

You set a goal for your life, you became a wonderful mother and loving wife.

You set a higher goal for yourself and how you did persist.

You graduated from college on your own and have now become a dentist!

And here we are again holding you close to us and sharing your moment of triumph.

FEDERAL HANDGUN LAWS AND STRICTER ENFORCEMENT CAN REDUCE CRIME

HON. ROBERT McCLORY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. McCLORY. Mr. Speaker, for some time now I have been endorsing stronger, more effective Federal gun laws aimed at deterring the criminal misuse of handguns.

An editorial which appeared in the May 27 edition of the Chicago Tribune emphasizes the need for such laws by citing statistics on the number of homicides that involved handguns during 1977.

Mr. Speaker, the time for action is now. The Congress must stop backing down from enacting effective handgun legislation. The public has demonstrated time and time again that it would support stronger gun laws and stricter enforcement of our current laws. One of President Carter's campaign promises was to enact this type of legislation. Almost 2 years have passed since we heard those promises.

Mr. Speaker, I hope each and every Member of this body will read the attached article from the Tribune. The points it makes deserve our consideration and prompt action. The article follows:

HOMICIDE BY HANDGUN

Of the 823 murders in Chicago in 1977, 444 involved handguns. Police Supt. James O'Grady drew the natural inference—"Without question the best method of curtailing senseless killings and maimings both of juveniles and adults is to minimize the ready availability of handguns."

True, people kill people. And true, people can be—and are—killed with a variety of instruments other than handguns. People can be killed with axes and ice picks—each used once in a 1977 Chicago killing. They can be killed with scissors and screwdrivers—each used twice in Chicago in 1977. But only handguns were used as many as 444 times.

More than half the murders [460] arose out of quarrels that escalated to a homicidal extreme. On the basis of combined statistics, the "typical" murder would be one committed with a handgun on a Saturday in September, between 1 and 4 a.m., by a black male aged 16. The police district with the fewest murders was the Central District, including the Loop.

Nearly everyone is against murder, but doing something about handguns remains controversial. In recent testimony before a House subcommittee, a spokesman for the National Rifle Association said, "Half the households in the United States presently own firearms." Obviously a highly popular response to the handgun menace is to go out and buy a handgun.

Chicago Judge Allen F. Rosin put it this way: "It's not only the bad people who carry guns, but the good people, too. The good people are afraid of the bad people, so they carry guns. That's the way it is on our streets nowadays."

This spring a Chicago alderman proposed an ordinance calling for a 10-day jail term for any unauthorized person found carrying a gun. The idea was endorsed by John Townsend, deputy chief of homicide and robbery detectives, and Joseph DiLeonardi, homicide commander. But the alderman sponsoring the proposal was lonely independent Ald. Martin J. Oberman [43d].

By now it should be obvious that only national legislation can possibly provide effective gun control.

Opinion polls show strong majorities in favor of national laws controlling the purchase of handguns. But the National Rifle Association continues to intimidate Congress. President Carter wants to outlaw Saturday-night specials, but hesitates to attempt anything before the next elections.

We can expect handguns to continue to mow down Americans at a rate of 9,000 a year—including hundreds in Chicago. This will go on and on until Congress and the President muster the resolution [if they ever do] "to minimize the ready availability of handguns," to quote Supt. O'Grady again.●

ALASKAN LANDS BILL

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, due to pressing business in my congressional district, I was absent on Friday, May 19 when the House of Representatives concluded consideration of H.R. 39, the Alaskan lands bill. Had I been present I would have voted "nay" on rollcall No. 338, an amendment to continue mineral assessment provisions, "nay" on rollcall No. 339 to recommit the bill to the Committees on Interior and Insular Affairs and Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and "yea" on rollcall No. 340, final passage of the bill.●

MINIMUM WAGE LEGISLATION

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, since coming to Congress, I have consistently supported Federal minimum wage legislation. I have also opposed most exemptions to these laws.

However, recent events have forced me—and, I believe, many of my colleagues—to reexamine our national minimum wage legislation in light of its effects on those whom the law is designed to enhance and upgrade.

Specifically to be reexamined is whether the appalling 16.9 percent unemployment rate for teenagers and the shocking 35.3 percent unemployment rate for black teens demand a move to a lower minimum wage for youth to encourage hiring among young people.

Raising the minimum wage also hits small businesses—especially of the mom-and-pop variety—terribly hard.

The following Washington Post article by William Raspberry points out our efforts to do good by raising the minimum wages might be self-defeating.

Indeed, as hard as it may be to accept, Mr. Speaker, our efforts to do good by periodically increasing the minimum wage might be backfiring on us.

RAISING WAGES—AND THE JOBLESS RATE

(By William Raspberry)

The D.C. City Council is considering legislation to put William and Willie Mae Clark out of business.

That's not what council members have in mind, of course. They are concerned about local residents who are struggling to live on $2.75 an hour—$110 for a full 40-hour week. They want to raise the local minimum wage to $3.25, 60 cents higher than the present federal minimum.

Viewed from the side of the struggling worker, the proposed increase seems impeccably humanitarian. William and Willie Mae Clark represent the other side of the picture.

They are owners and operators of the Sparkle Car Wash at 933 Florida Ave. NW, which they acquired—"for too much money"—after the 1968 riots. They are afraid to death that the minimum-wage increase will be approved.

"It would just about put us out of business," Mrs. Clark said the other day. "And not just us. A lot of blacks trying to make it in business would be hurt by this."

The Clarks have figured their break-even point at an average of three cars per hour per attendant. "That's what it takes, at $3 per car, to cover our overhead: mortgage, gas, electricity, water. The water bill alone has tripled in the 10 years we've been here, even though we're not using any more water."

If the minimum wage goes up, so does the overhead. Mr. Clark isn't sure the business can stand it. "There's only so much you can charge for washing a car before people say, 'The hell with it,'" she said.

One way of dealing with the increased minimum wage would be to lay off some people. But the Clarks' non-automated carwash requires a minimum of seven attendants.

Another way is to increase business, but if they knew how to do that they would have done it already.

The third way is to install automatic, exterior-only equipment. "If we could do that, we could operate the place with just me and my husband and maybe one or two other people. But being small and black, we can't get the financing to go automatic."

Even if they could, it would defeat the purpose of the City Council proposal. Instead of seven or nine employees making $2.75 an hour, they'd have one or two making $3.25. As it is, they could wind up with zero employees making zilch.

The Clarks represent an aspect of minimum-wage legislation that is frequently overlooked. The tendency is to look at those working now earning substandard wages and to think how much better off they would be if they all got raises. Some of those workers would, in fact, be better off. But some untold number would be out of work.

(Astonishingly, the federal Bureau of Labor Statistics has no data on the number of workers who lose their jobs as the result of increases in the minimum wage.)

Some businesses—groceries, gas stations and larger restaurants, for instance—are able to absorb minimum-wage boosts simply by raising their prices. Others, including carwashes, laundries and shoe-repair shops are likely to discover that there are limits to what the traffic will bear. At some point, you decide to wash your own car, or buy wash 'n' wear shirts, or bargain-basement, throw-away shoes.

The Clarks are a reminder of something else as well. Those who advocate increases in the minimum wage tend to think of fat-cat capitalists exploiting poor workers whom they employ at slave wages. There's no doubt that a lot of employers are paying their people less than they deserve and less than the employer can afford.

But not all of them. "They say low-income people need more money," Mrs. Clark said. "I would agree with that—if they were worth more.

"We'd like some more money, too. I pay myself less than the minimum wage—$70 a week. My husband, who works another job, draws $110 every two weeks. We drive a 1971 automobile."

The Clarks, in brief, are exploiting no one.

It is admirable, in these days when we all seem to be looking for ways to fatten our own bank accounts, that the council is paying some attention to those who work at poverty wages.

This is merely a reminder that it might be useful to pay some attention to Sparkle Car Wash, to all those automated carwashes that employ two people, to the laundries that are going out of business—and to the thousands of teen-agers who cannot find work because the law says they have to be paid more than the employers think they are worth—before they raise the minimum wage.●

FOOD AID TO LAOS

HON. PAUL SIMON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to note the State Department's announcement that it will provide 10,000 tons of food aid—mostly rice—to Laos.

The food situation in Laos has been serious since the end of last year. Drought and accompanying famine have been widespread. The need for emergency food aid has been clear for some time, and the 10,000 tons to be provided by the United States will help alleviate a potential catastrophe in Laos.

Whatever we may think of the current regime in Laos—and I regret its communistic nature—we should be proud of the United States for its humanitarian decision to provide emergency food relief.

As one who urged the State Department to decide in favor of food aid to Laos, I would like to mention the critical role played by my colleagues, Representatives PETE MCCLOSKEY and SONNY MONTGOMERY and Senator EDWARD M. KENNEDY. The people of the United States and the people of Laos can be thankful for these normally concerned Members of Congress.●

AFRICAN ULCER

HON. ANDREW JACOBS, JR.

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial from the May 17, 1978 Indianapolis Star is thoughtful and deserving consideration by every Member of Congress:

AFRICAN ULCER

Renewed warfare in Zaire's Shaba province—formerly Katanga province—reminds of the long shadow inevitably cast by unwise foreign policy long held by the United States and other western nations.

Cuban-led Katangese rebels from Angola, it's reported, have staged another invasion of Zaire's southernmost, mineral-rich region which borders on Angola. AZAP, Zaire's government-controlled news agency, says Zairian dictator Mobutu Sese Seko has convened his "crisis staff" and that the U.S., France, Belgium, Communist China and Morocco have been alerted "so that these countries would help Zaire to deal with the grave situation," as they did in last year's so-called "80-day war."

Commenting on the background of last year's upheaval, we pointed out that Katanga was forced to become part of Zaire—formerly the Belgian Congo—at the time that country gained independence in the early 1960s. Katanga, we noted, "had little ethnic connection with the Congo as a whole (merely a chunk of African territory carved out for his own gain a century earlier by Belgium's King Leopold II) and when independence finally dawned it wanted real independence—of its own." It failed.

Considered "essential" to Zaire's viability, it was bombed and blasted into submission by United Nations decree. Blindly obedient to the inadequately thought-out policy of self determination of nations earlier proclaimed by President Franklin D. Roosevelt, the U.S. government under President John F. Kennedy supplied the aircraft and munitions for the brutal operation.

But this African ulcer will not heal. Inflamed by blind adherence to a well-meaning policy proclaiming self-determination of nations but failing to define what nations, the Katangese unrest keeps boiling, boiling.

And—irony of ironies—while the Katangese were originally pro-western and the original Zaire government under Patrice Lumumba was clearly pro-communist, now the situation is reversed. Mobutu, though a typical African tyrant, is at least nominally pro-western. But the Katangese insurgents in desperation have grasped the tempting hand extended by Angola, backed by the Soviet Union and its Cuban mercenaries.

Last year France airlifted Moroccan troops to help dictator Mobutu keep under his thumb an African territory Zaire had no good right to own in the first place—unless by the discredited decree of long-dead, exploiter-supreme Leopold II. The U.S. and other countries provided monetary support.

So these questions must remain: How long will this foolishly implanted African malady continue to plague world peace? How long must the American people endure shallow, ill-conceived U.S. foreign "policy" which means well but fails to perceive its peace-shattering shortcomings? ●

WELFARE REFORM

HON. AL ULLMAN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. ULLMAN. Mr. Speaker, welfare reform remains one of the toughest challenges to this Congress. Comprehensive welfare plans from the White House and the Ad Hoc Subcommittee on Welfare carry price tags in excess of $20 billion. Because that is a cost that Congress is not willing to pay, many writers and pundits have pronounced welfare reform dead this year.

Welfare reform is not dead this year.

Within the approaches proposed in the House and the Senate, we have the foundation for a major welfare plan—at a reasonable cost—that can be passed this year.

To that end, I would recommend the lead editorial in the New York Times of May 23, 1978:

REDEEMING THE WELFARE PLEDGE

President Carter fulfilled a campaign pledge last year when he submitted a sweeping welfare reform proposal to Congress. But key Democrats, like House Ways and Means Chairman Ullman and Senate Finance Chairman Long, balked at the nearly $20 billion price tax and for all practical purposes declared the controversial plan dead on arrival. Even as Representative Corman's special subcommittee labored conscientiously on the original proposal, welfare reform was quietly stricken from Washington's legislative priority list.

Still, several Congressmen, notably Representative Ullman and Republican Senators Baker and Bellmon, persevered to devise more modest programs. All pretense of grandiose reform has vanished now, but a bill incorporating four critical ingredients of reform stands a chance—if only Congress and the Administration can overcome the partisanship that impedes compromise on the competing Democratic and Republican plans.

Minimum national benefit levels. Whatever new welfare law Congress passes, it should establish uniform benefit levels. Benefits now vary dramatically, from a high of $6132 for a family of four in New York City to a low of $2556 in Mississippi. The Ullman formula would raise the national minimum to $4200, an increase over present levels in 11 states.

Welfare fathers. Any new welfare plan should also extend coverage nationally to families headed by unemployed fathers, eliminating pressure that drives families apart. At present, nearly half the states refuse such coverage. Both the Ullman and Baker-Bellmon bills would require it of all states, although to limit such coverage to 17 weeks a year, as the Ullman bill does, seems harsh.

Job creation. If the cycle of welfare dependency and poverty is ever to be broken, welfare recipients must be brought into the world of work. They need training in marketable skills and jobs that offer reasonable wages and hope for the future. Baker-Bellmon is the more appealing on this score. It would provide public service jobs under CETA (Comprehensive Employment and Training Act), the primary Federal job program for the poor. The Ullman plan would set a minimum-wage ceiling for such jobs; Baker-Bellmon would pay prevailing public service wages, thus avoiding the creation of another level of workers beneath the already stigmatized CETA work force. More important, it would virtually guarantee a job to at least one parent in every two parent family.

Fiscal relief. Lastly, Washington must help the cities and states. Poverty—and migration of the poor—is a national problem, attributable largely to forces beyond local control. Yet the costs are now shared by all levels of government. For example, New York City pays 25 percent—over $400 million next fiscal year—of the aid to families with children. Mayors and governors will find Baker-Bellmon the more generous of the two measures in providing added fiscal relief.

Like the larger original Carter plan, both bills address the most glaring deficiencies of the current welfare system. Their differences seem reconcilable. And the President, who deserves credit for trying to straighten out the "welfare mess," can help by pushing welfare higher on his legislative agenda. In the end, substance will largely be dictated by cost. Even within the $7 to $9 billion ceiling on new expenditures suggested by Representative Ullman, Congress can fashion a sound welfare package that responds to pressing human needs. Is that too much to expect of a White House and Congress controlled by Democrats, self-proclaimed champions of the poor?

THE DEFENSE OF THE WEST

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. DORNAN. Mr. Speaker, before the outbreak of World War II, Sir Winston Churchill warned his countrymen of the impending dangers posed by the growth of Nazi Germany's military power. But his pleadings were to no avail. His speeches were even censored by the British Broadcasting Co. in 1936 as being too alarmist. Opposition to the diabolical schemes of Hitler and his ministers of death came too late, and millions of innocents paid the ultimate price for the follies of their complacent political leaders.

In the past 10 years we have witnessed yet another peacetime military buildup of unprecedented proportions, certainly unprecedented since Hitler prepared his war machine for the conquest of Europe. In virtually every field of modern weaponry, the Soviet Union has made impressive gains. It was recently reported in the prestigious technical journal, Aviation Week and Space Technology, that Soviet tests of heavy SS–18 and SS–19 ICBM's surpassed the most pessimistic projections of Western defense analysts. In six different tests of these new Soviet heavy missiles, at least 50 percent of them were able to strike targets within a radius of 600 feet. Needless to say, the Carter administration failed once again properly to gage the degree of Soviet progress in improving their missile accuracies. No longer can the United States take comfort in the prevalent view that the West enjoys an uncontested technological superiority.

Mr. Speaker, once again the peace and security of the West is threatened by the vast demonic energies of a ruthless totalitarian power. In Europe, along the front lines of Western defense, there exists an imbalance of conventional forces favoring the Communist bloc by a margin of roughly 2 to 1.

Perhaps it is fitting that another Churchill should once again warn us of the impending danger. In his timely article, "The Defense of the West," Winston Churchill II outlines the need for greater cooperation among Western allies. He fears a new arms agreement with the Soviets that will result in lopsided advantages for the Soviet Union.

Mr. Speaker, I commend Mr. Churchill's wise and timely counsel to my colleagues:

THE DEFENSE OF THE WEST

(By Winston S. Churchill II)

For more than 30 years the peoples of Europe—unique among the generations of the 20th century—have enjoyed the inestimable blessings of peace. Out of the ashes and devastation of two World Wars a new Europe has been built—a Europe in which the living standard of the average family far exceeds anything dreamed of only a few years ago and which has achieved for its peoples unprecedented social and technological advances.

The peoples of the Western democracies fought the Second World War with, above all, two goals in mind: the maintenance or restoration of their countries' freedom and the establishment of a lasting peace. There was a widespread recognition that mistakes were made in 1919 which should not be repeated in 1945; principal among these had been the oppression of the vanquished—summed up in Lloyd George's phrase: "We will squeeze the German lemon until the pips squeak"—and the failure to accept the right of peoples to self-determination. Thus, when the United Nations was established in 1946, it was founded on the principles of self-determination and respect for human rights and had as its aim the maintenance of peace through the restraint of aggression by a worldwide system of collective security.

When the last survivors of the Nazi concentration camps were liberated, there was a general assumption in the West, whose peoples had endured, suffered and sacrificed so much, that they had won freedom, not for themselves alone, but for all mankind. Alas, it was not to be. In the moment of triumph, the wartime alliance was betrayed. The Soviet Red Army which occupied half of Europe, coming ostensibly as "Liberators" from the Nazi scourge, came in fact as a force of invasion and occupation. A generation and a half after the end of the War, more than 200 million people of Eastern Europe continue to be denied both basic human rights as individuals and self-determination as nations. For many, for example the Czechoslovaks, seven years of Nazi occupation has been followed by more than thirty years of Soviet occupation. Today, in Czechoslovakia alone, there are no fewer than five Soviet divisions with more troops and tanks than Britain's entire Rhine army—they are not there as a defensive force, but as an army of occupation. In each of these countries, we see long traditions of nationhood and independence submerged under the oppressive rule of totalitarian dictatorship and the police state.

THE GROWING SOVIET CHALLENGE

Today a new challenge presents itself to the Western democracies, a challenge which, for the first time in a generation, seriously calls in question the prospects for stability in Europe and for world peace. Not content with denying human rights to their own peoples and independence to the nations of Eastern Europe, the narrow political clique yielding power in the Kremlin is in danger of disturbing the delicate equilibrium of forces which has been the foundation of world peace for more than a generation. Once again we see a single nation, ruled by totalitarian dictatorship and motivated by an unconcealed determination to dominate the world, building up a war-machine far beyond any requirement of self-defense or the deterrence of war. Whether the Soviet leadership has embarked on this policy of arms-escalation for the purpose of furthering aggressive military designs or of providing a strong power-base from which to wield decisive diplomatic pressure and military blackmail, is impossible to know. To argue the point is irrelevant for, whatever the intentions of the Soviet leadership today, they can change over a weekend. What is indisputable is that this buildup, together with the political designs that are behind it, represents a challenge which the Western democracies will ignore at their peril. Our democratic society is being put to the test—at the end of the day are we to be found wanting? The brutal challenge that confronts us inevitably, and rightly, leads us to reexamine the values on which our society is founded. Are those values still valid today? If so, are they worth defending? And, if we conclude that they are, what are we prepared to sacrifice to defend them? Are we prepared to spend as much on defense (£110.64 or $220 per capita in 1976), as for example, we spend on alcohol and tobacco (£162.46 or $324)? Are we, if need be, prepared to make the ultimate sacrifice and lay down our lives in defense of freedom, as two generations have so selflessly done before us?

The Soviet Union's challenge to the West is threefold: a growing military threat at both strategic and conventional levels; a military and economic assault against the Third World as evidenced by recent Soviet involvement, direct and through third parties, in Africa; and a campaign of political subversion designed to undermine the Western democracies from within—the case of Portugal being merely the most flagrant so far.

THE SOVIET BID FOR SUPREMACY

While engaging the West for much of the 1970's in a diplomatic offensive known as "detente," with the aim of persuading the Western democracies to lower their guard—a ploy in which they have been remarkably successful—the Soviet leadership simultaneously launched an all-out bid to achieve military supremacy over the West.

The NATO allies have long drawn comfort from the fact that, though they are outnumbered by the Soviets in the primary measures of military power—tanks, artillery, maneuver battalions, armored personnel carriers, combat aircraft, and so forth—NATO holds a significant "qualitative" advantage in its weapons, particularly nuclear and advanced conventional weapons in the same way that the Victorian empire-builders fighting superior numbers of Africans and Indians, took heart from the fact, immortalized by Belloc, that "We have the Maxim gun, and they have not!"

The days of effortless supremacy for the West are now gone. By a supreme effort, involving the diversion of vast economic and technological resources, the Soviets have taken the SALT I Agreement of May 1972 as the opportunity to catch up with the United States and achieve parity or "rough equivalence" in nuclear strike-power.

The Soviets now enjoy the psychological strength of no longer being the underdog in the nuclear race and, by the same token, the United States, having lost its former clear advantage, may feel more wary of being involved in any future confrontation with the Soviets. Meanwhile in Europe the strengthening of Soviet conventional forces—more than one million Soviet soldiers with no fewer than 25,000 tanks now face Western Europe—has given the Soviet Union the capability of a "standing start" attack, as was so dramatically achieved in Egypt and Syria against Israel on October 6, 1973. The Western allies, like Israel, base their defensive strategy on the mobilization of reservists and the deployment of reinforcements, but the recent development in Soviet strike capability means, according to the top military authorities in NATO, that the Alliance can now be sure of no more than 72 hours warning—rather than the 30 days warning or tension period previously relied upon.

Most worrying of all are the current trends in Soviet production. Soviet armaments factories are churning out 3,000/4,000 T-64 tanks, 1,800 combat aircraft and 250 nuclear missiles a year—out-building Britain's entire inventory every three months. Neither the restraint of arms-production shown by the West nor the mood of "detente" has in any way been reflected in an abatement in the arms-escalation policies of the Soviet Union.

Thus, it must be the aim of the Western democracies to secure a serious and binding arms-control agreement with the Soviets. However, with the exception of an agreement not to deploy more than one anti-ballistic missile (ABM) system, little has been achieved in the SALT negotiations, and nothing at all in the talks on Mutual Balance Force Reductions (MBFR).

In the absence of a satisfactory SALT or MBFR agreement, the NATO allies will have no choice but to make a seriously increased effort to strengthen their defenses, for only in this way can it be brought home to the Soviet leadership that they are wasting their time—not to say their peoples' resources—through their arms-escalating policies and that they had best revert to the previous policies of peaceful co-existence that prevailed under Khruschev. If they do not, the nations of the Western Alliance will find themselves on the downward path they have trodden with such disastrous results already once this century, a path on which the political options open to them will become more and more restricted until they reach the point of no return.

EUROPE MUST STRENGTHEN ITSELF

For too long the nations of Western Europe have taken a free ride off the United States and have neglected their own defenses. If some 300 million of the most prosperous and technologically capable people of the world are not prepared to make such modest sacrifices as are required to maintain their freedom, they will not long remain free, nor will they deserve to. Britain can play, if she so chooses, a key part in strengthening the cohesion and unity of Western Europe and can, by giving a good example to our European partners, strengthen Europe's defenses so as to ensure that the deterrent is seen to be valid by those who may contemplate either war or military blackmail.

If we ignore the warnings, if we fail to confront the harsh realities that are before us, there is a danger that we will see peace, which we have taken so much for granted.

slipping from our grasp. All too frequently it has been glibly asserted by politicians that the facts cannot be put before the people as they would be unpopular. I venture to believe that the overwhleming majority of the British people, when confronted with the facts, have enough common sense and moral fiber to recognize that there is, in the last resort, nothing more important to them than to continue to be able to live their lives in peace and in freedom. Only by arousing our people to the new dangers that confront them can we hope to turn the world away from the disaster course on which it is set. If we can achieve this, there can be no doubt that the strengths and values of the free society will prove more enduring than the ideologies of the totalitarian police states. Although these despotisms give the appearance of being all-powerful, they are in reality rotten to the core and they will ultimately be overthrown by their own peoples demanding liberation—provided only that the Western democracies are able to keep the torch of freedom burning brightly.

THE LATEST PORK BARREL: H.R. 10929

HON. CARL D. PURSELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. PURSELL. Mr. Speaker, during my years of public service, the formulation of budgets has always been of particular interest to me. While a member of the Michigan State Senate, I served on the appropriations committee, which provided me with firsthand knowledge of the budgetary process and its many intricacies. Based on this experience and knowledge, I am a very firm supporter of efficient, sensible budgets—and am outraged when attempts are made to inflate budgets, especially with "pork-barrel" projects. This type of senseless spending only serves to weaken our monetary system by adding to the spiral of rising costs.

Therefore, I was most disturbed by the actions of the House with regard to H.R. 10929, the Department of Defense Appropriation Authorization Act of 1979. As a former military officer, I strongly support a strong, solid national defense. I believe that America must remain first in defense if we are to maintain our position of world leadership. However, I become very distressed when I see this Congress passing authorization bills which are inflated with pork-barrel projects—especially in the area of defense. I think that there is little doubt in anyone's mind that H.R. 10929 is our latest pork barrel.

Of particular concern to me is the committee's attempt to provide DOD assistance to the Lake Placid Olympic Organizing Committee. The Department of Defense did participate in the 1960 Winter Olympics at Squaw Valley, but it did so at a very low level. But what is more important, is that the 1960 participation by DOD was embodied in separate legislation on which hearings were held, and the funding provided to support these activities was approved through the normal appropriations process. The 1960 participation was limited to services uniquely within the competence of the DOD" and were not intended "as a replacement for services available from civilian sources."

But today, we find support for the Olympics in our Defense Department authorization, with virtually open-ended services available. I support the Olympics wholeheartedly, but I state unequivocally that this type of provision does not belong in a defense authorization bill. It is really the worst type of pork-barrel, as the provision virtually hands a blank check to the Olympic Organizing Committee.

Therefore, I was very disappointed to see Congresswoman SCHROEDER's amendment to rectify this provision go down to defeat in a voice vote. I can only wonder how long this type of pork-barrel will continue until the American public cries "enough."

In a larger sense, I think the Congress is failing in its duty to work toward a balanced budget. H.R. 10929 was reported out of the Armed Services Committee a full $2,423,308,000 over the President's budget request. How can we, as representatives of the people, talk about reducing inflation and lowering taxes when we continue to approve such inflationary bills?

I think it is high time that we put some credence into our rhetoric. I was one of the 67 Members of Congress who voted against H.R. 10929. I would hope that in the future more Members will take a closer look at our seemingly mindless authorizing habits and begin to heed the cry of the American public to hold the line on unnecessary spending.●

MIAMI EDUCATOR HONORED

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, it has recently come to my attention that an outstanding educator in my area has been honored by the publication the Migrant Educator as one of the outstanding educators serving the children of migrant workers.

I would like to share with our colleagues something of the background and achievements of this former migrant child who is now giving so freely of herself to help other children of migrant families.

Dr. Billie Clare Davis is the director of the high school equivalency program, University of Miami. A former migrant who grew up in the agricultural migrant stream, Dr. Davis has spent a number of years as a freelance writer, lecturer, and consultant in areas of education, curriculum, and social problems as related to migrants, multiethnic, Spanish-speaking, and disadvantaged children and youth.

Dr. Davis is best known for her autobiographical story, "I Was a Hobo Kid," which relates experiences of a migrant child. The story originally appeared in Saturday Evening Post and was later featured in numerous other anthologies. Hon. CLAUDE D. PEPPER,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE PEPPER: Dr. Billie Clare Davis, Director of the High School Equivalency Program at the University of Miami, was recognized as Educator of the Month in a recent issue of our newsletter. A copy of the article is furnished for your information.

The Migrant Educator is a monthly news publication read in more than 40 States by those concerned with the education of children who migrate with parents seeking employment in agriculture and fishing. The main objectives of the newsletter are to serve as a channel for disseminating news and useful information, encourage interstate cooperative efforts, and stimulate professionalization and program pride among migrant educators.

I regret the delay in bringing this to your attention. We are now instituting a procedure for regularly informing members of Congress of these awards. It has been our experience that, when so informed, the Congressman was pleased to learn of national recognition given to one of his constituents, and often further honored the recipient by sending a congratulatory letter.

Sincerely,

JOHN D. HUSS,
Editor.

MINIMUM WAGE LAWS DEPRIVE TEENAGERS OF JOBS

HON. ROBERT McCLORY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. McCLORY. Mr. Speaker, last October I expressed concern over the adverse effects which minimum wage increases have on our Nation's youth.

Many businesses—faced with paying higher wages for services they normally provide through the hiring of youth or other low-pay, unskilled workers—choose to discontinue those services or hire workers with better skills.

According to an article by Richard Strout in the May 12 edition of the Christian Science Monitor, my fears appear to be well founded. Unemployment among teenagers—especially minority teenagers—has risen since the minimum wage increased this past January.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot afford to have this happen. Many of these teenagers seek part-time employment to help support their families, others to pay for their college tuition. It would seem to me that establishing a youth wage differential would be beneficial both to the teenagers and to those employers of unskilled labor who thus are able to avoid raising prices for services provided to consumers. At the same time, I do not feel it would have any adverse effects on the job market for skilled workers. The editorial follows:

JOBLESS TEEN-AGERS AND THE HIGHER MINIMUM WAGE

(By Richard L. Strout)

I am beginning to think that I have been wrong all these years on the minimum wage. It has been accepted dogma of most economic histories that minimum wages are the appropriate way to protect low income workers; the idea goes far back to steel workers' strikes in President Harding's administration. They worked seven-day weeks and 10-hour days, and once a fortnight a 24-hour shift. Pay was low. The eight-hour day had the support of President Harding—one of the few social reforms. I believe, that he ever vigorously backed. Along with it came the minimum wage. The AFL–CIO is all out for the minimum wage and the Carter administration has just raised the federal minimum to balance off inflation.

The time has come, I think, to take another look. Rep. Paul Simon, a liberal Democrat from Illinois, is troubled by the matter as are many others. Yes, a minimum wage by all means, to make sure that low pay workers get a floor under their income. But how about the unemployed, unskilled youths who can't get jobs because the minimum wage is more than they're worth? There are hundreds of thousands of them.

Department of Labor statistics on youth unemployment show teen-age unemployment at 17.3 percent in March—a point and a half higher than last December. The minimum wage was increased last January and teen-age unemployment rose, too. Unemployment for black teen-age workers is currently at an incredible 39 percent. It is up a point since the new minimum wage act. In fact overall unemployment of all workers has fallen in the same period, down from 6.4 percent to 6.2 percent; every category of workers listed by the Bureau of Labor Statistics has shown improvement but one—the teen-agers that the minimum wage was supposed to aid.

The minimum wage was increased last January from $2.30 an hour to $2.65, or 15 percent. Organized labor hailed it. Alas, the subsequent loss of teen-age jobs just about canceled out, the increase in jobs due to the government's own employment programs.

Debate over this has gone on a long time. In 1970 the Labor Department documented the matter. It reported, "There is some basis for the inference that the effect of the federal manpower programs and the federal minimum wage have tended to offset each other." A later paper by the Congressional Research Service called this result "ironic and even pathetic." Indeed it is. Mr. Simon quotes the director of the Congressional Budget Office as testifying recently: "Increases in the minimum wage . . . can diminish employment opportunities for less skilled workers, particularly teen-agers."

Black teen-agers hanging about in American slums without the discipline of jobs are tragic and menacing. Over half of them now are unemployed. It is no way to run a democracy. There have been riots in these circumstances in times past and there could be again. Minimum wage laws were enacted to aid the poor and friendless but the time has come to reconsider their effect. Instead of fighting reconsideration organized labor should encourage it.

Why can't the United States do what many European countries do, institute youth wage differentials to stimulate employment for youngsters? Mr. Simon notes that the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development recently held an international conference to consider youth unemployment. It referred directly to the adverse effect of minimum wages on youth employment; opinion appears "fairly widespread" it reported, that one cause of idle youth is the "relatively high wage rates . . . for entry level jobs." Cut through the jargon and what it says is that a lot of employers can't afford regular pay to unskilled youngsters: "By and large, a single undifferentiated minimum seems to reduce teen-age employment . . . reduced work experience may have long-lasting consequences."

In short, I think that a reform that was spendid in its time needs to be reconsidered. Liberal Mr. Simon concludes, "We ought to have a lower minimum wage for young workers."●

TUITION TAX CREDITS

HON. EDWARD W. PATTISON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. PATTISON of New York. Mr. Speaker, today we have completed action on one of the more controversial bills to come before the 95th Congress—the Tuition Tax Credit Act. As is often the case with such legislation, the issue has been reduced to its most simplistic terms. Those of us who voted against the bill will bear the stigma of opposing a much needed tax break for parents with children in private primary and secondary schools.

I would like to take this opportunity to state that my opposition to H.R. 12050 was based solely on my opposition to providing tuition tax credits to college students.

I support modest tax credits for tuition paid for private elementary and secondary school students. I voted for an amendment to have the bill cover these students. I supported the amendment which would have provided loans to all college students.

If the rule governing the debate on H.R. 12050 had allowed it, I would have supported a move to strike the provision which gave tuition tax credits to college students, and I could have then supported the bill. Unfortunately, such action was not possible under the rule. I therefore had no choice but to oppose final passage of H.R. 12050.

I continue my support for tuition tax credits for private elementary and secondary students. I will support any future bill which provides reasonable credits for these students alone.

My opposition to tuition tax credits for college students stems from my belief that such aid would be both ineffective and inequitable. Higher education is a major, long-term investment for most families. When tuition bills are due, a tuition tax credit several months of a year in the future will not be very useful to those families having trouble meeting this expense. Even if it were paid in advance, a credit of $250 toward an annual expense of $3,000 to $5,000 simply does not help enough to make a difference.

The Carter administration's proposal to increase direct Federal student grants to middle- and low-income families and loans to all students, regardless of income, would be much more effective in meeting this need. Furthermore, such direct aid can be distributed selectively to those who actually need assistance. A general tuition tax credit for college students will result in a huge drain on the Treasury, and an increase in the deficit, with no positive benefits. I could not vote for such a bill.

Credits for private elementary and secondary students are another story. Parents who send their children to private schools help take a burden off public schools while still paying taxes to support the public system. They deserve a break. Furthermore, the modest tuition tax credit proposed in the Vanik amendment, which I supported, would have provided this break while not encouraging any significant shift in school enrollment from public to private schools.

I wish I could have supported final passage of a bill which would have given credit only to elementary and secondary students. I did not have this option, and I could not, in good conscience, support tuition tax credits for college students.

Since the college tuition tax program far exceeded the loss of the elementary and secondary tuition tax, the bad aspects of the legislation far outweighed the good and I therefore opposed final passage of H.R. 12050.●

THE HUMAN RIGHTS PROBLEM IN CAMBODIA

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, the human rights problem in Cambodia today deserves the attention of all American citizens. This body passed a resolution last month (H. Con. Res. 573) requesting that the President call upon foreign countries which have diplomatic relations with Cambodia to rectify the inhuman situation by both the use of direct influence upon the Cambodian authorities and by raising the issue in the appropriate international forums.

In my own view, the United States should do everything in its power—short of military intervention—to help bring the violations of human rights in Cambodia to an end and to help alleviate the plight of the hundreds of thousands who have suffered. I have urged the United States minimally to provide refuge for some 15,000 Cambodians reported to be in camps in Thailand and elsewhere in Southeast Asia, and to make it clear that other escapees would be welcome here.

At its annual convention on May 21, the American Jewish Committee—a distinguished Jewish organization that has stood up for human rights throughout the world—passed a resolution specifically dealing with the Cambodian problem. The committee called upon the Third World nations to vocalize their disapproval of the Khmer Rouge regime and requested that provisions be made to alleviate the abominable conditions the refugees are forced to endure. The AJC also suggested that the President meet with the leaders of other nations in order to place multinational pressure upon the regime. Finally, there was a proposal to establish a nongovernmental inquiry tribunal for the purpose of investigating the actual circumstances of the Cambodian situation through the testimony of firsthand witnesses and victims.

I hereby submit the text of this forthright resolution for the consideration of my colleagues and commend the efforts of this worthy organization.

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
STATEMENT ON CAMBODIA

If published reports of mass killings in Cambodia by its Communist rulers are even only partially true, then the scale of murder in that small, tragic land, perpetrated in pursuit of a political end, approaches the enormity of the Nazi extermination based on a myth of racial purity. If these reports are true, the Cambodian regime is guilty of the ultimately violation of human rights—the mass murder of its own citizens.

The AJC is dismayed by the failure of all but a few states to take cognizance of the killings and the failure of the UN itself to deal with the situation with the great urgency it warrants.

We call upon the developing nations of the world, especially in Africa and Asia, to register publicly their outrage and protest against this deliberate and massive destruction of life.

We urge the admission to our country under the parole provisions of the immigration law, or under special legislation, if necessary, the thousands of Cambodian refugees living in tragic circumstances in camps in Thailand. We also urge other countries to admit generous numbers of such refugees.

We call on President Carter to invite the leaders of the democratic nations to meet with him to consider possible courses of action to bring to bear maximum moral and political pressure against the reign of terror in Cambodia.

We call upon concerned non-governmental organizations to establish an international inquiry tribunal composed of jurists, religious leaders and other persons of high reputation respected internationally or in their countries for their independence and integrity, to hear public testimony for escapees and other with first-hand knowledge, and make known their findings.●

TRIBUTE TO EARL A. ROTH

HON. CARL D. PURSELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. PURSELL. Mr. Speaker, it is with sincerest warmth and admiration that I pay tribute today to Earl A. Roth, who has been the dean of the College of Business at Eastern Michigan University since its creation in 1964. I had the privilege of studying under Dean Roth while I attended Eastern Michigan University, and so I am especially aware of his fine talents and academic leadership.

I pay tribute to Dean Roth today because he will soon be retiring from his post at the college of business. On July 1, 1978 this educator will end 25 years of service to EMU—a very distinguished career indeed. Prior to his appointment as dean, he served as head of the department of business for 3 years. At Eastern, Roth has served as chairman of the faculty senate, chairman of the Eastern Michigan University North Central Association of Self Study, acting dean of the graduate school, and acting vice president for instruction.

Prior to coming to Eastern, he served as head of the distributive education department at the University of Missouri and State director of the Missouri Department of Education from 1950 to 1952. Dean Roth is also a member of Phi Delta Kappa, Delta Pi Epsilon, and Beta Gamma Sigma and is listed in "Who's Who in American College and University Administration" and "Who's Who in the Midwest." His bachelors and masters degrees were earned at Ohio State University and his doctorate from Indiana University.

Under Dean Roth, Eastern's college of business has grown to be the second largest business college in Michigan, and certainly one of the finest in the Midwest. He has had a spectacular career and has touched many thousands of students over the years.

I wish Dean Roth every happiness and success in his retirement. He will certainly be missed at Eastern, but the university will be forever richer for having had his guidance.●

PUBLIC AWARENESS OF ASBESTOS DISEASES

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, for the past several months I have been investigating the problems associated with occupational exposure to asbestos. This is a problem which is, justifiably, attracting increased public attention.

It is a problem for which a solution must be found. Because the Federal Government is the employer of a large number of workers who are exposed to asbestos, I am hopeful that we will be a leader in working out the solution. Secretary Califano has provided a real service in increasing public awareness of the problem, as increased awareness is a step that must necessarily be taken on the road to solution. It is in this vein that I am submitting for the RECORD an article that appeared in Friday's Los Angeles Times. I hope that all of my colleagues will take the time to read it, and to ponder the severity of the problem which faces us.

HAVE HIGH CANCER RISK—THOUSANDS EXPOSED TO ASBESTOS TO BE STUDIED

(By Henry Weinstein)

SAN FRANCISCO.—John Morris, a 49-year-old submarine repairman, is living "on borrowed time." But each day, he says, he is thankful to Dr. Phillip Polakoff, a Berkeley physician who told Morris last summer that he—like thousands of other shipyard workers—is a victim of asbestosis, an irreversible disease resulting from a scarring of the lungs.

There is no medication for the disease. Morris is still working, but he experiences shortness of breath. That makes climbing on the ladders in the submarines at Mare Island Naval Shipyard in Vallejo more stressful.

But he says he is living "a day at a time, and so far I'm in pretty good shape."

The disease decreases the amount of oxygen that gets to the blood system. If Morris feels the slightest "symptoms" in his lungs or develops a cold, he immediately goes to Polakoff because he knows he could rapidly develop pneumonia and die.

Polakoff's voice breaks when he talks about Morris and the thousands of workers he and his colleagues at the newly formed Western Institute for Occupational/Environmental Sciences, Inc., hope to aid in their battle against the illness caused by asbestos, the so-called "magic mineral" that has 3,000 industrial uses.

Thursday Polakoff launched the most extensive screening program of persons exposed to asbestos that has been undertaken anywhere in the country. He does not yet know the persons in the program will be and hopes to find them over the next month. Such persons have a much higher chance than the norm of developing lung cancer, stomach cancer and other diseases.

This summer Polakoff and his associates plan to examine 2,000 current and former workers who have been exposed to asbestos, mostly in shipyards from World War II to the present. They will utilize a hotline where concerned workers can call for information and a mobile van supplied by the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health to supply free X rays to the workers. The data will be analyzed at USC cancer control center.

Of the 2,000 persons the new institute hopes to examine, 500 will be women who worked in the shipyards during World War II and have not worked around asbestos since that time. Persons with an exposure as short as a month or two have developed asbestos-related diseases, according to Health, Education and Welfare Department officials, as have wives who merely washed their husbands' asbestos-laden clothes. A number of these women have developed mesothelioma, a rare cancer of the chest and abdominal lining.

The remaining 1,500 participants will include 300 longshoremen who are at least 40 years old and who had their initial contact with asbestos at least 15 years earlier, and 1,200 presently employed or retired ship workers.

Thus far, Polakoff's nonprofit institute has received $150,000 in federal funding, $50,000 from various unions and "$650 from one company" to launch the program. The study needs another $300,000.

The project is a landmark that "if successful will be used in other communities and with other dangerous substances," said Gabriel Gillotti, regional administrator of the federal Occupational Safety and Health Agency here. "Up to now the problem of asbestos-related diseases hasn't been a priority. We have to find out the magnitude and the severity of the problem and publicize it," he said at a news conference here.

Federal Health, Education, and Welfare Secretary Joseph A. Califano last month warned millions of Americans who worked with asbestos during and after World War II that as many as 51% of them might die of lung cancer or other diseases as a result of that exposure. About 4.5 million of the 8 to 11 million persons he said are in danger worked in shipyards during World War II.

Polakoff already has had 359 present and former Mare Island workers X rayed at Herrick Memorial Hospital in Berkeley. Each of the workers had a minimum of more than 10 years time elapsed since initial exposure to asbestos. Fifty-nine percent of those examined had lung abnormalities and 23% of those had significant abnormalities, Polakoff said.

Polakoff stated that about 400,000 residents of the Bay Area alone are at high risk for lung cancer because of contact with asbestos. He based this figure on estimates that 2.5 million people worked in the bustling shipyards at Hunters Point, Emeryville, Alameda, Richmond, Vallejo and Sausalito during the 1940s.

The problem is not limited to shipyard workers, noted Art Carter, chief of the state's Division of Industrial Safety. He said 3,500 businesses in California are now registered as users of carcinogens (cancer-causing substances), and that 68,000 workers handle asbestos presently in California. A number of these work in brake-lining repair shops in Southern California and should have special medical checkups, he said.

Along the same line, John Henning, secretary of the California Federation of Labor (AFL–CIO) said "this is not just a northern California problem." Thousands of persons, he said, have been employed in shipyards in the Los Angeles and Long Beach areas who are also at risk.

Polakoff cited a study by Dr. Jean Felton who X rayed 500 workers at the Long Beach Naval Shipyard in June, 1977. "These men had primarily short-term exposures (one to 14 years). Despite this brief elapsed period from onset of exposure, 30% had asbestos-related abnormalities," Polakoff said.

Normally, it takes 15 to 35 years after initial exposure for the diseases to appear and by then it is often too late to do anything. Workers have breathed in millions of microscopic-like asbestos fibers which are tasteless, odorless, invisible and indestructible.

"Once a fiber enters the lung, it rarely comes out," said Polakoff, who is a certified specialist in occupational medicine.

The mobile van this summer will do 100 or more X rays a day starting June 17 at union halls in Vallejo, Oakland and San Francisco. The X rays will be provided to those examined on a confidential basis. Persons detected to have problems will be urged to see a physician and be put on some sort of health maintenance program or have further tests.

"This is only one study," said Polakoff, 32, who studied medicine at Wayne State University in Detroit and at Oxford. "People who have been exposed to asbestos need a whole battery of tests."

He said a study by Dr. Irving Selikoff of New York, the nation's leading researcher on the relationship of asbestos to cancer, showed that a smoker exposed to asbestos is 30 times more likely to develop lung cancer than a nonsmoker who has been exposed, and 90 times more likely than a nonexposed nonsmoker.

Polakoff was asked to look into the problem by John Robinson of the Mare Island Metal Trade Council in December, 1976, after Robinson discovered that a number of his union colleagues had developed lung problems.

He had sent 25 X rays to Selikoff at Mt. Sinai Hospital in New York and was shocked to learn that 17 of them showed serious problems. "The Navy took these X rays and they never said anything to any of the workers," said Robinson. Naval officials said they were unaware of any problems when questioned later.●

PROTECTION FOR THE BOUNDARY WATERS CANOE AREA

HON. JIM LEACH

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. LEACH. Mr. Speaker, the Boundary Waters Canoe Area in northeastern Minnesota is the most heavily used unit in the National Wilderness Preservation System. This federally managed wilderness is the largest interconnecting lakeland wilderness in the country, making it the premier spot in the Nation for wilderness canoeing and camping.

The 1964 Wilderness Act applies contradictory standards to the BWCA and has resulted in conflicts in the management and use of the area, as well as in major litigation as the demands and pressures on BWCA resources have increased.

The Burton-Vento compromise bill, approved by the House Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, seeks to clarify the purposes of the Wilderness Act. The legislation to be considered on the floor shortly will protect the BWCA wilderness resources while still providing certain flexibility to accommodate local concerns.

It is important to recognize that once a wilderness area is despoiled, many years and much in the way of energy and resources are required to rebuild it. There are few places in the world where the beauty of nature is more strikingly reflected than the Boundary Waters of northern Minnesota. We have a compelling responsibility to look to the future and to protect for our children and grandchildren the possibility of experiencing a world of nature as well as of technology. I strongly urge sympathetic consideration be given to the Burton-Vento compromise bill.●

MANOLO REYES

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I request permission to include in the RECORD the following testimony given by Dr. Manolo Reyes, distinguished former Latin American commentator for WTVJ channel 4 in Miami, before a congressional committee about the Castro regime's most recent African military adventures. Dr. Reyes has in the past offered numerous committees of the Congress a wealth of information and analyses pertinent to the Castro government and I believe his generosity of time and talent merit this recognition:

TESTIMONY

Since 1970 up to now I have testified twelve times before Committees and Subcommittees of the Senate and the House of Representatives about the Cuban situation. For the most part, my testimony has been based on reports and information emanated from within Cuba. I have also given my own evaluation and analysis according to the issues and fact-pattern received from the Island. This testimony is based on the same premises.

The Fidel Castro regime's involvement in Africa is more larger than it has been said up to now. The actual number of Cuban mercenary troops in Africa range from 66,000 to 70,000.

Most of the soldiers that Castro sent to Africa, up to approximately the first 40,000, were reservists of his army. To achieve that goal he had to call those up to 45 years of age. He did not want to touch the three big armies that he has inside Cuba: The Western Army, The Eastern Army and The Central Army.

Facing an increasing battleground in Africa, now Castro has begun to draw soldiers for the African Military Adventure from those three armies. Castro is sending the troops to Africa following the orders of the Soviet Union, which is supplying uniforms, weapons, ammunitions and several contingents of men for the African Adventure through an international communist brigade.

At the same time the Soviet Union is helping Castro to maintain the terror in Cuba. Since Castro is draining soldiers from his three big armies for Africa, the Soviet Union is providing Russian soldiers to Cuba, on a basis of 4 to 1. Per each 4 soldiers that Castro sends to Africa, Moscow sends 1 to Cuba.

This has increased the number of Soviet soldiers about 5,000 in the first quarter of this year. There are now, stationed inside

Cuba, spread throughout the Island, some 30,000 Soviet troops.

Fidel Castro and the Soviet Union want to re-edited the British Colonialism that once existed in Africa, and that ended when the British Government withdrew from that part of the world.

There is a big unrest inside Cuba because the majority of the Cuban people is against the communist military adventure in Africa. The Cuban people claim that Castro condemned the American presence in Vietnam and now he has made a Vietnam in Africa. But above all, the majority of the Cuban people pointed out to specific reasons for their unrest.

1. Cubans have nothing to do in Africa. It is not a war of the Cubans. And by nature, Cubans are not worriers.

2. Thousands of Cuban families have been hit very hard due to the African war because their husbands, fathers, brothers and sons are returning from Africa injured, crippled or in a coffin. And all of that for the Communist system, repelled by nature, by the Cubans—and a war—that has no exigent reasons for the Cubans.

There are three other strong reasons of friction between the Cuban people, Castro and the Soviet Union.

1. At the beginning of his regime, Castro said he was going to expel the United States from the Island because Cuba was for the Cubans. The reality shows that Castro expelled the Americans from Cuba and brought the Soviets into the Island, in a bigger number and broader authority. Today the final word in Cuba, whether it is the main decision of the Government or in a little town, the decision is made by a Russian official.

2. Castro has been in power for almost 20 years and even though he has pledged innumerable times that Cuba was going to be a golden cup—the Cuban people still have a Ration Card for everything. They have to make long lines—under sun or rain—for many hours to get small quantities of basic food or clothing. The Russians have special places and passes to buy whatever they want. Cubans are not allowed to get near those places.

3. The heavy authority exercised by the Russian officers upon the Cuban soldiers. Tension has been so great that Russian and Cuban soldiers have been separated throughout the Island in different military barracks.

In special paragraph we point out the crucial situation that Castro is having with the new breed of Cubans. Castro is not a symbol anymore for the Cuban youth. The Batista ordeal happened 20 years ago and Castro now has nothing to offer to the Cuban youngsters, "Only a Ration Card—and Africa."

Castro continues the exportation of his so-called "Communist Revolution". To that effect he has inside Cuba more than 200 guerrilla training schools to instruct Red Agents from differing parts of the world. Recently, in this month of April, CBS–TV confirmed in its 60 Minutes Sunday Show in a program entitled Terror International, that some of the most important international terrorists, responsible of killings and kidnappings throughout the world, were trained in Cuba. Also is logical to assume, that since the majority of terrroist acts have been committed lately in Europe, there is a growing possibility that those kind of acts would start to proliferate soon in America, including nuclear terrorism.

Finally, there is another frustration for the Cuban people inside the Island, frustration brought about by the United States giving up the Panama Canal. Most of the Cuban people firmly believe that after the Panama Canal, now Washington will give up the Guantanamo Naval Base, the only military base of the United States inside a communist territory.

And they are also fearful due to the sentence of the late Marshall Grechko, Minister of Defense of the Soviet Union, who once said: "He who domains the maritime passages of the world, will domain the world."●

DAVIS-BACON FRUSTRATES HOME WEATHERIZATION PROGRAM

HON. TOM HAGEDORN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. HAGEDORN. Mr. Speaker, in 1976, Congress appropriated $200 million for home weatherization programs to be administered under the community action program (CAP) of the Community Services Administration (CSA). What has happened to this program, as has been the fate of numerous other Federal construction programs, has been summarized by Eric Green in the latest issue of the Reporter:

What the Congress giveth to CAP's, the U.S. Department of Labor [through its administration of the Davis-Bacon Act] . . . may have taketh away.

A Department of Labor memorandum on the applicability of the Davis-Bacon Act to weatherization projects performed by CETA workers has seriously jeopardized further CAP involvement in the program by forcing the payment of wages far in excess of those that can be afforded. If the Davis-Bacon provisions are rigidly enforced, many CAP's will be required to pay CETA weatherization workers $10 per hour and above, with most CAP's completely unable to pay such wages.

Thus, as is typical with the Davis-Bacon Act, not only does the taxpayer suffer but so do the intended program beneficiaries. I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues Field Memorandum No. 433–77 which has muddied up the waters of the home weatherization program, as well as the full text of Mr. Green's article. It is only the latest case study of the counterproductiveness of the Davis-Bacon Act:

FIELD MEMORANDUM No. 433–77

The Labor Department has included in the memo answers to some of the most commonly asked questions about Davis-Bacon. A sample of those questions and answers follow:

Question: Are Davis-Bacon wage rates required for individuals employed in weatherization and home repair activities?

Answer: If the individuals are employed as participants and no federal funds other than CETA are being used, then Davis-Bacon wage rates would not be applicable (except, of course, as described in the "background" portion of this Field Memorandum). If another Federal source of funds is being used in conjunction with work being performed by CETA participants, then the requirements of the other Federal funding source must be used to determine whether Davis-Bacon rates must be paid.

Question: What form should consultation with appropriate labor organizations take?

Answer: Prime sponsors are to notify area officials of building-trades unions, or union councils, of their intention to design, approve or operate construction-related CETA work activities. These officials are to be provided copies of CETA components or project applications which describe work statements, pay rates, and other operating details. After union officials have been allowed a period to inspect the plans, meetings are to be held with union officials to review plans. This requirement does not mandate that the prime sponsor obtain union concurrence, but rather insures that affected unions are informed and provides a reasonable opportunity for these unions to comment, and discuss potential problems or make suggestions before the proposed work activity begins. Prime sponsors must then consider advice given or positions taken by union officials, but may proceed to implement planned activities in accordance with other CETA requirements.

CAA's FEAR ENFORCEMENT OF DAVIS BACON ACT

(By Eric Green)

What the Congress giveth to CAP's, the U.S. Department of Labor and, inadvertently, the Community Services Administration may taketh away.

CSA and its 865 subsidiaries at the local level, the Community Action Agencies, rejoiced when Congress agreed in 1976 to provide $200 million for a home weatherization program, which would be run in large part by CSA and the CAP's.

As the September/October, 1976 National Center Reporter noted, CSA and the CAP's looked upon weatherization as the golden chance to improve their credibility throughout the country. If CAP's and CSA operated a well run weatherization program, so the theory went, CAP's could buttress their longstanding contention that they have operated community action projetcs with "demonstrated effectiveness."

Most CAP's to date have indeed run well-oiled weatherization programs. But last September, as a result of repeated requests from CSA and the CETA prime sponsors, the U.S. Department of Labor unleashed a new "field memorandum" which may ultimately cause a tragic denouement in weatherization for CAP's.

This new field memo, #433–77 has raised a tempest in the CAP world. The memorandum was supposed to clarify the relationship of the Davis-Bacon Act to the hiring of CETA workers for weatherization projects. But instead, the "clarifying" memo has (1) muddied the waters to make Davis-Bacon rules appear even more incomprehensible and/or (2) jeopardized further CAP involvement in weatherization.

CAP's must wrestle with three factors as they try to unscramble the meaning of this new memorandum: (1) they must recognize the new questions raised by this memo; (2) they must evaluate its effects; and (3) they must find solutions to their Davis-Bacon problems in order to continue weatherization projects.

THE QUESTIONS

The Department of Labor says officially that the hiring of CETA workers for weatherization projects must comply with the provisions of the Davis-Bacon Act if the project is multi-funded. The Davis-Bacon Act, in brief, says that construction workers must be paid at the prevailing wage rate for the area. The Secretary of Labor establishes the prevailing rate for each region in the country. If Davis-Bacon provisions are strictly enforced, many CAP's will be forced to pay CETA weatherization workers $10 per hour and higher in order to meet the union wage scale. CAP's find it financially impossible to pay those salaries.

But what the Labor Department says officially about Davis-Bacon and what it says

"off the record" remain two separate matters. Despite their new field memorandum and their official warnings about the need to comply with Davis-Bacon, the fact remains that DOL will accept, de facto, implicit agreements between CAP's and the unions which will satisfy both parties, while skirting the issue of Davis-Bacon. These tacit, informal arrangements allow CAP's to remain in weatherization and hold down the cost to pay CETA weatherization workers.

The Labor Unions agree to these arrangements because (1) they remain uninterested in providing weatherization jobs to members. Weatherization projects are notorious for offering low-paying salaries.

Unions also agree because (2) they improve their community image. The unions can point with self-satisfied pride to their concern about finding jobs for the disadvantaged population. In reality, finding weatherization jobs for the disadvantaged insures that union workers will face less competition for the higher-paying skilled jobs. In many instances, however, the disadvantaged lack the skills to perform the higher-paying union jobs.

Dick Saul, Chief of CSA's weatherization program, looks upon the new Labor Department memorandum as "awakening a sleeping dog."

"I think most CAP's have worked things out," he said. "The problem as I understand it is that the Labor Department is not leaving well enough alone."

Saul says an interagency meeting between CSA and the Labor Department would help resolve the issue of enforcing Davis-Bacon. He says that forcing CAP's to hire weatherization workers at the same wage scale as carpenters and more highly skilled labor remains inherently unfair.

Saul says that the Labor Department's new zealousness in enforcing Davis-Bacon (and as a result providing more jobs for union members) may be an outgrowth of the Ford Administration's attempt to win political support from the "hard-hats."

"I think this has led to some rather outlandish interpretations," Saul added. "At that time there was probably some politics behind it. There was high unemployment in the building trades and everybody was trying to get votes and it was done at the top level. I think we're sort of stuck with some of that . . . It's something we have to get on top of and I'm hoping there could be some negotiations and understandings. I don't think we're ready at this point to say anything in an article because there hasn't been any negotiation."

The Department of Labor's Mel Bernstein indicts CSA, among others, for causing the present furor about Davis-Bacon. Bernstein said CSA asked for an interpretation of the Davis-Bacon Act because "they didn't like what they saw in the law."

"The people, including those at CSA, were screaming for clarification of Davis-Bacon. Now they've got it. Those are the risks they took in asking for it. The local agencies, the prime sponsors, and the Community Action Agencies were yelling and screaming for an interpretation. I'm sure they were asking for a ruling because in many cases the local unions were on their backs," Bernstein said. Bernstein is a member of the Employment and Training Administration's Taskforce for Youth Programs.

Another ETA manpower specialist, Eric Johnson, says the Labor Department wrote the field memorandum because "we were getting more and more calls from prime sponsors about the legality of hiring CETA workers for weatherization."

"There was an increasing problem as we brought more and more people into the CETA system," Johnson recalled. "Prime sponsors in different regions were calling us and asking, 'Is that all right? Is this all right?' Rather than continuing to act in an ad hoc way, we decided to set up a clearer policy concerning the CAP relationship with Davis-Bacon."

THE EFFECTS

Jim Gardner, a Manpower Specialist for the Department of Energy, says that the CETA program is not considered in most cases to be covered by Davis-Bacon.

Gardner, who wrote a first draft of the No. 433–77 regulations when he worked at the Labor Department, explains that the labor union determines the fate of the CAP weatherization program.

"The problems develop in areas with both high unemployment and a strong unionized industry," he noted. "In these cases, the unions are very reluctant to say to the price sponsor, 'O.K., you go ahead, you work on these poor people's homes.' The unions are very reluctant to say, 'We have got these skilled carpenters who are out of work, you hire them and pay them the minimum wage.' That's against the principles of the union also. So you run into a dilemma in these types of cases. If you must comply with Davis-Bacon and you can't resolve your problem with the union, then you're out of business," Gardner says.

Gardner adds that Davis-Bacon requires CAP's to pay the prevailing wage for CETA weatherization workers. The prevailing wage is determined by computing the wage rates for jobs that compare to weatherization positions.

But many CAP's wonder what happens when no agency or union performs work that is similar to weatherization. How do you then determine your wage scale, CAP's ask. Gardner explains that in cases where no one is performing work comparable to wetherization, the experience of the employee comes into play in determining the prevailing wage.

"If no one does comparable work, you base the wage rate on the experience of the people you're hiring. When you're talking about CETA employees, you're talking about people who really don't have any skills. Davis-Bacon makes allowances for that. Where a journeyman might get $10/hour, an untrained individual might get $5/hour. So you retain that type of flexibility in CETA also."

Gardner indicates, however, that CAP's involvement in weatherization does not usually bother the labor union.

"If the government doesn't go in there and weatherize those homes, those homeowners are not going to have the money to have anyone else do it," Gardner points out. "They don't even have the money to buy the materials to do it themselves let alone possess the skills that would be required to weatherize a home. So you're really not taking anything away in doing this. Ordinarily the unions are more than happy to cooperate even to the point of lending the CAP's some technical assistance if needed. If those union members want jobs, then you have a problem because they'll go in and say you must pay union wages."

WEATHERIZATION

The Program Chief for the weatherization program for a large northeastern state says that union cooperation has allowed his local agencies to run weatherization programs throughout the state.

"Davis-Bacon does not really apply here as far as I can tell," he said.

"We certainly haven't had the problems and we have a highly unionized state," the program chief claims. "Where you run into the problem is with the unions. We had some problems initially but we worked them out. We've never had a problem with CETA funds, with wages or with unions."

He adds, "You have to deal with unions. You can't ignore those guys. They're there and you have to be able to accept a certain amount of rhetoric. We'll sit down with the unions and work it out. It's when you ignore them or try to flout them that you then get into trouble. If you don't (deal with the unions), you deserve to get pounded. If your country or city government is dividing the people, or they're saying they're not going to pay more than 'x' numbers of dollars, then let them fight with the unions."

SITUATION IN BELLINGHAM, WASH.

Suzanne Deming runs a $1 million weatherization program in a 5000 square mile rural area spanning four counties in north-central Washington State. Her present dilemma illustrates what happens when different parties interpret in different ways Davis-Bacon applicability to the hiring of CETA weatherization projects.

Deming blames CSA and her local "balance of state" program agent for her problems in delivering weatherization to her region. Unless the situation is resolved, she says, her program faces possible termination.

"There is the theory that you could get around Davis-Bacon by classifying weatherization people in non-prevailing wage scale jobs," she said. "Around here the only thing that would be comparable to weatherization would be carpenter's jobs or carpenter's apprentices . . . It's up to CSA to say that Davis-Bacon does not apply to weatherization. But CSA has dodged the issue for the last 3½ years. What needs to be done is for CSA to say 'no, this is not work on public facilities for major rehabilitation. This is energy conservation. The people involved are not necessarily skilled carpenters. They're trainees. They're getting on-the-job training.'" (Davis-Bacon requires paying the prevailing wage for major rehabilitation work on public facilities.)

Deming says CSA continues to dodge the issue because of its reluctance to become engulfed in a "hassle" with the unions. She says in her own case that she has made informal, unwritten agreements with the local unions, similar to the way some other states resolved their Davis-Bacon problems.

"Locally, I have a pretty good relationship with my unions and they are not giving me any trouble. We have made a very good informal agreement about how we can handle this . . . But we can't put it in writing because the unions are not able to do it and neither are we . . . putting it on paper would show a lot of violations."

Deming maintains that the local CSA program agent, who oversees her weatherization project, refuses to provide assistance to clear up the confusion about Davis-Bacon. The program unit for her region wants a formal, written agreement between the unions and her Community Action Agency, the Whatcom County Opportunity Council, before it will agree to waive Davis-Bacon.

"But we just can't do that," she maintained. "The argument is that we are in violation of Davis-Bacon . . . and that we're going to have to pay retroactively for all the times we violated the law. The bottom line about this whole situation is that CSA should just clean up this matter. If they did that, there shouldn't be any problem at all.

"We've had no assistance from our regional CSA office. It may be a small issue to them but when you have to operate that program at the local level it is no small issue. I think it has come to the point that something has to be done because these weatherization programs are no longer just small projects. It's become major. We're also very much involved in housing issues and unless we get some clarification on Davis-Bacon, it's going to jeopardize some of the other things we're doing. CSA has got to do something; otherwise CAP's are going to be out of weatherization."

"If CSA told us, then we would be in good shape," Cloyd Campbell, CETA supervisor in Deming's region said. "We would prefer it in writing to make sure our tracks are covered. Then DOL would hold us harmless (would not hold his agency liable) and we would have no worries at all."

But Campbell warns that CSA seems reluctant to ask for a waiver. "CSA has bosses too—Congress being the top dog. Apparently they don't want to give the statement," Campbell said, adding, "If I was in CSA's position I'd take a chance . . . you just can't let your CAP agencies hang on forever by the thumbs. You've got to come out with a decision. This may sound a little strong, but it sounds to me like a dereliction of duties."

SOLUTIONS

Mel Bernstein from the Labor Department suggests that CSA ask for a special waiver from Congress to exempt weatherization programs and other forms of CETA public service employment from Davis-Bacon guidelines.

Bernstein says that Congress and the labor unions should be amenable to supporting the waiver for CAP's.

"Congress is very supportive of weatherization," he said. "When we talk about weatherization, we're talking about relatively unskilled jobs. It requires elementary carpentry, installing a window or blowing insulation into an attic . . . not highly skilled jobs. They do not conflict with highly skilled unionized jobs. Any recommendation to help facilitate the weatherization project would probably go over well in Congress."

But Eric Johnson at DOL paints a far darker picture for a waiver for CAP's involved in weatherization. He says that bending CETA reauthorization legislation does not alter Davis-Bacon provisions for weatherization programs.

"It appears the most definitive way to resolve this issue in favor of not paying the prevailing wage would be to change the legislation for other construction type funding programs," Johnson commented. "The fact that Davis-Bacon is not mentioned in the CETA legislation is not really the pertinent point here. I do not see any indication that Congress will change the present wording on the law. Merely deleting Davis-Bacon requirements under CETA still won't make it clear whether to absolve people (such as CAP's) from paying Davis-Bacon wage rates." Johnson questions whether Congress remains strongly committed to continuing weatherization programs.

"I feel that Congress is no so strongly interested in weatherization projects that they would be willing to anger the unions and go against their own previously set policy regarding Davis-Bacon," Johnson continued "They wouldn't feel it was worth doing. While weatherization is something really nice and they've been sticking it on a lot of places lately, I haven't seen the movement afoot to really push that kind of thing. If someone put this waiver up and the unions said 'nay' it would be stopped. Even if the unions sat back and just watched. Congress would still let it (the waiver) die. I don't see a movement to push it other than rhetorically."

Johnson agrees that the present strategy, which calls for union and CAP's to agree sub rosa, has enabled CAA's to stay in weatherization.

"With union guidance and review, a prime sponsor can set up special types of projects which in effect strictly follow the law and still allow part of the work to be done with CETA people at less than Davis-Bacon wages."

THE HENNEPEN COUNTY SOLUTION

Bill Brumfield, the prime sponsor for a CAP weatherization program in Hennepin County, Minnesota, suggests another alternative to keep Community Action Agencies in weatherization.

"We've been able to make some agreements with the local union here. The union wants us to pay union supervisor and maybe three or four CETA apprentices. What we've done here is pay the wages from community block money to pick up the wage differential.

"CAP's should get a commitment that the local government will come up with the money to make prevailing wage. They should find a way to pay the differential by utilizing either some local money or some other federal monies. General revenue sharing money is another possibility. You don't have any strings attached with that. Countercyclical (emergency) funds for areas with unemployment higher than 4.5 percent is another posssibility . . . We don't have any confusion about the law. We just have to comply with it."

OPINION FROM DOE

Jim Gardner from the Department of Energy concludes that ultimately the political realities in each prime sponsor area will determine the fate of the CAP weatherization program.

"The big thing," he said, "is how much strength does the union have and what is their feeling about whether weatherization comes under Davis-Bacon. If the union says 'yes it does' then you've got a lot of problems.

"But you've got a lot of regions that fall in gray areas. The prime sponsors are afraid to make a decision on Davis-Bacon because they fear that a year down the road, they'll come down the wrong way. They're afraid that the government will hold them liable for back pay and that they'll have to pay very large amounts of money. Prime sponsors who are in that particular type of situation should read that memorandum (No. 433–77) and figure out what to do. Those who are in a real fix should be able to tell from reading that memo what action they should take."

The U.S. Department of Labor's Field Memorandum No. 433–77 was sent on September 13, 1977 to all regional administrators of the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act. The memo was written, according to DOL, to uniformly apply the provisions of Davis-Bacon to all CETA programs.●

BAUCUS MAKES EVERY EFFORT

HON. ROBERT W. EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, while I favor tuition tax credits, one of our colleagues who is opposed to tuition tax credits—MAX BAUCUS—was not able to be here today. MAX has one of the best attendance records in Congress, and I know that he mails a compilation of all of his votes to every western Montana household.

I say this, because I know that MAX made every effort to be here today to vote on this issue. Because of the Northwest Airlines strike and a number of other problems, he was simply unable to get here from Montana on time.

MAX had his staff working through the night trying to make some sort of connections to get him here for today's votes and back home again in time for his primary election June 6. This turned out to be impossible. But he has made his position on tuition tax credits clear by arranging for pairs on each vote.

While I disagree with Congressman BAUCUS' opposition to tuition tax credits, I think the people of Montana can be proud of his willingness to take a stand on a controversial issue even when he was unable to make the vote.●

ONE-MAN FIGHT TO PUT INCENTIVE IN WELFARE AID

HON. RICHARD L. OTTINGER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker. Recently, an article appeared in the New York Times regarding Dr. Leonard Greene who is the head of the Institute for Socioeconomic Studies in White Plains. I would like to take this opportunity to share this with my colleagues.

The article follows:

[From the New York Times, Apr. 23, 1978]

ONE-MAN FIGHT TO PUT INCENTIVE IN WELFARE AID

(By Nancy Rubin)

When Leonard Green injured his hands last year doing temporary work in a Mount Vernon factory, his foreman urged him to go on relief. "You're a fool to continue working," said the man, "you've got lots of kids and you'll get more benefits on welfare than you will by working here."

Leonard Greene was not surprised. Founder and president of the Institute for Socioeconomic Studies, he had intentionally falsified his identification (though not his injury), so that he could personally witness the plight of the unskilled worker. He was now experiencing first-hand what he had always known in theory: that the current welfare programs provide individuals with powerful work disincentives, rather than encouraging them to seek employment.

In a study released by the Institute for Socioeconomic Studies late last summer on Westchester's food-stamp program, Dr. Greene's observations were once again confirmed. The survey, which was conducted in conjunction with the Institute for Suburban Governance of Pace University indicated that the number of persons participating in the Federally sponsored food-stamp program within the county had doubled during the last five years. Today, it is believed to include over 40,000 individuals—most of them young, poor, and living in female-headed households—at the cost of $700,000 a month. Seventy-nine percent of the recipients also draw relief from other forms of public assistance:

Although the growth rate for the food-stamp program in Westchester falls well below the national level, the most disturbing aspect of the study is the dependency patterns formed by users of food stamps. According to the study, more than two-thirds of the program participants have received stamps for over a year, while 53 percent apparently having lost all hope of economic recovery, expects to continue receiving stamps for at least another 12 months. These figures, Dr. Greene explained, suggest that once people start receiving public assistance, they find it difficult to give it up.

"The government, with all good intentions, has hurt the people, instead of helping them. It has created generations of people on the dole," said Dr. Greene, who has repeatedly testified before Congressional committees on various aspects of welfare reform. "We've become hooked on the idea of providing public assistance benefits, rather than developing programs that would give people some incentive to work."

Dr. Greene, who is also a computer scientist and inventor of flight instruments, such as the Stall Warning Indicator (which is now standard equipment on many aircraft), is the president of the Safe Flight Instrument Corporation in White Plains. He first became interested in welfare reform over a decade ago, when he offered an unskilled black worker training as a computer assemblyman in his factory. "A few days later he came back and told me he couldn't take the job because he would be making too much money for his family to qualify for low-income housing," recalled Dr. Greene. "That really bothered me and I got to wondering what kind of society we had that fostered that kind of dependency."

Criticizing the current welfare benefit laws for their inefficiency and poor design, Dr. Greene noted that the Institute is currently involved in a study analyzing $250 billion in Federal funds being distributed through 182 separate welfare programs across the nation. Much of it, he added, is needlessly swelling the national debt, undermining the economy, and doing little to alleviate the real causes of poverty.

"Many people think the current welfare system is ineffective because of the opportunities for fraud and abuse," he said, "but that's only a small part of the problem. The larger observation is that the government is oppressing the people with its benefit regulations, and destroying the fabric of American life."

The economist cited the case of a married couple that reaches retirement age. Despite the wife's years of work and contribution to the labor force, she is expected to give up her rights to Social Security benefits in lieu of her husband's allowance. "That's essentially a penalty for having a wedding certificate," Dr. Greene said, "and just one instance of the many inequities in our laws."

Or take the case of the small farmer who must utilize all his land each year in order to survive. At the same time, the wealthier farmer is able to idle his land, collect government benefits for doing so, and even become involved in selling futures on government-supported price controls. "We've forced out the farmer with our grapes-of-wrath approach," said Dr. Greene. "The trouble with our laws is that they don't allow the near poor any vertical progression."

To remedy the situation, Dr. Greene proposes "cashing out" all the existing benefit programs, including low-income housing, food stamps and other welfare benefits. In their place, Dr. Greene has developed the "fair share" concept of welfare reform, or negative income tax, which would give all citizens, whether rich or poor, individual income allowances. Persons with little or no income would receive the full benefit of the allowance, while individuals with higher incomes would be taxed on a graduated scale, similar to the current income tax laws. Non-need families, thus, would not be eligible to receive their allowances, but their monies would be turned back to the government instead to help fund the program.

"The idea is to make funds available to everyone who really needs them," said Dr. Greene, "but not by arbitrarily cutting off people because they fall above a certain minimal level of income, as the laws require today. Instead, the allowance is meant to be distributed on a sliding scale, so that a man who is living with his family just above the poverty line, for instance, might receive enough assistance to help him keep his house or farm. It might make all the difference and provide him with the incentive to keep on working."

A firm believer in the individual's ability to better himself, Dr. Greene has applied many of his economic theories to the operation of his own business. At Safe Flight, where he has always hired large numbers of disadvantaged youths, the handicapped and older workers, Dr. Green encourages his employees to advance through the ranks to administrative and executive positions. Several years ago, in fact, the company attracted several highly skilled technicians from a competitor with an early retirement policy to come work at Safe Flight, where "abilities, not birthdays," were stressed.

The recipient of countless awards and honors, Dr. Greene has received a commendation from the Department of Health, Education and Welfare for his establishment of the Chain Scholarship Fund, a national college scholarship foundation. In 1974 he was named one of the top three independent business leaders in the United States as the Albert Gallatin Award winner for the Northeast. The businessman said he was particularly pleased with that award because it was "an endorsement of his fundamental beliefs about the positive relationship that can be formed between management and labor."

But perhaps the best insight into the man was offered during a recent Congressional hearing on welfare reform when a reporter asked Dr. Greene why a prominent businessman like himself had become so actively involved in the reform of national economic policies. "I don't want to be a successful member of a sinking ship," he said, "we're all in this together and if we ignore the people trapped in our economy, we are essentially undermining the future of the quality of life in this country, and the value of all the things we have strived for." ●

REFRAIN FROM WATCHING TELEVISION 1 NIGHT EACH WEEK

HON. WILLIAM M. KETCHUM

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. KETCHUM. Mr. Speaker, West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has asked his people to refrain from watching television one night each week, utilizing that evening to enhance the family unit. I consider this a most laudable suggestion, one which perhaps our own people might do well to emulate.

Not only is the emphasis on family life a commendable notion in itself—the suggestion that we relieve ourselves of television's declining quality programing for at least one evening a week is doubly attractive. While there is no denying that the electronic media have the capability to educate and inform, the caliber of programs now being aired hardly takes advantage of this opportunity. On the whole, television seems determined to appeal to our baser nature; to lionize the less desirable segments of society, and to fill in the lulls between sensational productions with vapid and inane presentations.

How many of us have looked on as our children and grandchildren gaze at the one-eyed monster with glassy eyes? Entire evenings may pass in total family silence as a stream of ridiculous programs pass across the screen. Evidence of growing dissatisfaction with television's programing is given by the number of corporations which are withdrawing their sponsorship in protest.

I do not claim to be an expert psychologist, and I will make no comment as to the supposed link between violent crime and television violence. I simply believe that the American people would do well to rediscover the lost art of family enjoyment, communication, and conversation while the tube lies dormant one night out of seven. Perhaps if enough of us adhere to this policy, television programers will realize we are a bit brighter than they had thought. If they do not, at least we will be spared their insulting efforts for a short period of time.●

HON. MAX BAUCUS

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. Speaker, on May 17, 18, and 19, 1978, I was absent from the legislative session of the House of Representatives.

The House considered H.R. 39, the Alaskan National Interest Lands Conservation Act during this period. This bill was the subject of lengthy debate and extensive compromise in the Committees of Interior and Insular Affairs and Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Knowing that numerous amendments would be offered on the floor I decided to oppose all amendments and support the open rule and the Committee compromise. Thus had I been present, I would have voted in the following manner:

Rollcall No. 330, H.R. 39: Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation. The House agreed to the rule (H. Res. 1186) under which the bill was considered, "yes."

Rollcall No. 335, H.R. 39: Alaskan National Interest Lands Conservation. The House rejected an amendment that sought to make certain boundary changes in order to reduce the total acreage within parks, wildlife refuges by approximately 5 million acres to permit selection of these lands by the State of Alaska "no"; and Rollcall No. 336, H.R. 39: Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation. The House rejected an amendment that sought to reduce lands to be designated as wilderness from approximately 66 million acres to 33 million acres, "no."

Rollcall No. 337, H.R. 39: Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation. The House agreed to resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole "yes"

Rollcall No. 338, H.R. 39: Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation. The House agreed to an amendment that continues minerals assessments provisions and requires the President to submit a proposal to Congress by October 1, 1981, for a procedure for evaluation applications by individuals wishing to carry out mineral exploration or extraction on conservation system lands "no"

Rollcall No. 339, H.R. 39: Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation. The House rejected a motion to recommit the bill to the Committees on Interior Affairs and Merchant Marine and Fisheries with instructions to report it back forthwith containing an amendment in the nature of a substitute (text of H.R. 12703 previously offered in the Committee of the Whole), "no"; and Rollcall 340, H.R. 39: Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation. The House passed the measure to designate certain lands in the state of Alaska as units of the National Park, National Wildlife Refuge, National Wild and Scenic Rivers and National Wilderness Systems, "yes".●

LIFTING THE TURKISH ARMS EMBARGO

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues an editorial entitled "Carter and the Turks" which appeared in the Christian Science Monitor on Friday, May 19, 1978.

Soon, Congress will be considering H.R. 12514, the International Security Assistance Act of 1978, which contains provisions regarding Greece and Turkey and the lifting of the partial arms embargo against Turkey. I urge my fellow Members of Congress to give careful and full consideration to this very important foreign policy decision whether to sustain provisions of H.R. 12514 and lift the embargo against Turkey.

The editorial urges us, as Members of Congress, to make this decision on the basis of a rational foreign policy judgment on whether lifting the embargo will support NATO and strengthen hopes for progress on a Cyprus settlement.

It seems to me that there is now a very crucial need for a positive foreign policy initiative in the Eastern Mediterranean to move the situation off dead center. Lifting the embargo can hopefully help create an environment in which successful negotiations for a Cyprus settlement can occur and in which Greek and Turkish confidence can be restored in the NATO alliance.

The editorial follows:

[From the Christian Science Monitor, May 19, 1978]

CARTER AND THE TURKS

President Carter has a host of foreign policy problems but none more serious now than the question of Turkey's weakened role in NATO. So far he has not given this matter top priority. The Panama treaties and the Middle East arms package consumed his energies in Congress. But now that the day has been won on these issues, it is indispensable that the President similarly pull out all stops in an effort to get Congress to lift the U.S. arms embargo on Turkey. No less is at stake than the strength and stability of the Western alliance in the face of growing Soviet assertiveness.

It is ironic that at a time when the Russians are exploiting fresh opportunities to extend their influence—in Africa, the Middle East, Afghanistan—the U.S. Congress is helping them. For that in effect is what it is doing. Washington's European allies alone seem to understand that if Turkey is not soon helped to improve its deteriorating defenses, the whole southeastern flank of NATO, now a strategic Mediterranean buffer between the Soviet Union and the Middle East and between East and West, will be softened. Already the United States has had to shut down some of its military installations in Turkey.

Turkish Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit does not go so far as to suggest that Turkey will pull out of the alliance. But, under growing pressures at home, he is being forced to look to other alternatives if the U.S. Congress continues its myopic policy. He has told Mr. Carter that Ankara will not sign a join statement on NATO's future at the upcoming summit in Washington and he hints that Turkey will reduce the size of its armed forces (it now has the second-largest standing army in NATO).

That may sound like arm-twisting to some, but, in Mr. Ecevit's eyes, things look quite different. Failure of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to end the embargo, imposed when Turkish troops occupied northern Cyprus, has had serious repercussions in Turkey. Many Turks feel that they are being treated like second-class citizens, that the West does not appreciate them, and therefore that they should perhaps stand all alone, bolstering their ties with the nonaligned world and—yes—with the Soviet Union.

On the Cyrus issue the Turks believe they have put forward reasonable opening proposals. UN Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim in fact termed them concrete and substantial, but the Greek Cypriots refuse to talk now—a stance Ankara views suspiciously as tied to a desire to keep the pro-Greek deadlock in Congress.

Whether these suspicions are true or not, the American lawmakers can be faulted for playing politics instead of pursuing principle It is no secret that the pro-Greek lobby is highly organized and cohesive. It has influence over some important congressional posts and its financial support of Democrats and Republicans alike is a matter of public record.

Can it be doubted that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and other members of Congress would view the situation differently if, instead of the pro-Greek chorus, pro-Turkish voices were heard in the land? To Turkey's disadvantage, there are few such. Hence President Carter faces a tough task in persuading the lawmakers to be ruled by good sense and patriotism rather than their political emotions. He managed this admirably well in the case of the Mideast arms deal. For the first time the power of the Jewish lobby in the Congress was broken because of a perceived overriding national interest.

This must be the touchstone in the Turkish arms issue as well. There is no rationale in sounding the alarm about the Soviet Union's inroads around the world and growing challenge to the West—when the West itself does not keep its house in order.●

ADMIRALTY ISLAND, ALASKA

HON. LAMAR GUDGER

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. GUDGER. Mr. Speaker, one of the areas in Alaska that most needs protection is Admiralty Island. It is an island 100 miles long and 25 miles wide, located just south of Juneau, where it is a memorable part of the Alaskan experience to millions of people who have traveled the Inside Passage, which bounds the island on the east.

Foremost among those who seek permanent protection of Admiralty Island's fisheries, wildlife, and scenic values are the people who live there, the Tlingit Indians of Angoon. The village of Angoon, the only community on the island, is the last stronghold of traditional Tlingit culture—one of the most advanced and artistic cultures in North America.

I am a cosponsor of H.R. 8651, a bill initiated by the people of Angoon, to establish the Admiralty Island National Preserve as part of the national park system. After considering this proposal in conjunction with the larger Alaska bill (H.R. 39), the Subcommittee on General Oversight and Alaska Lands reached agreement with the people of Angoon to include Admiralty Island as a designated wilderness area in H.R. 39. This is strongly supported by the people of Angoon.

Moreover the island is famous for its salmon, with an estimated production of 2 million fish every year. Sitka deer inhabit the island, and the bays and tidal flats are habitat for migrating waterfowl and shorebirds. In addition, it is one of the best areas in Alaska for brown bear. As early as 1901, President Theodore Roosevelt recommended the island as a brown bear refuge. Also biologists find that Admiralty has more bald eagles, an endangered species and our national symbol, than all the other 49 States combined.

In view of the cultural value, the bald eagle habitat and the brown bear habitat, Admiralty Island needs wilderness protection, House enactment of H.R. 39, assuming similar action in the Senate, guarantees this protection.●

PIERCE COUNTY RADIO WATCH HONORED

HON. NORMAN D. DICKS

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. DICKS. Mr. Speaker, local and State leaders in Pierce County, Wash., have designated May as Pierce County Radio Watch Month in recognition of an outstanding public service organization in my district.

This most dedicated organization has, for 7 years, maintained an around-the-clock monitoring service on channel 9; the national emergency channel. They notify local and State law enforcement agencies of any emergencies that occur in the area.

Because of the earnestness with which Pierce County Radio Watch has approached this responsibility, they have earned a reputation of accuracy and effectiveness among local law enforcement agencies. They have developed an excellent system for screening information before they transmit it; and they have instigated procedures to get correct and useful information to the right people. Every agency they deal with has nothing but praise for the coordinating efforts of this valuable community service organization.

The Pierce County Sheriff's Office and the Tacoma Police Department receive more than 100 calls a month and the Washington State Patrol gets about 60 calls a month from Pierce County Radio Watch. Often, these calls are the first they receive of an emergency, that can range from a lone female who ran out of gas at 3 a.m., to a stalled auto on Interstate 5 during rush hour traffic, to such an emergency as a recent gyrocopter crash in Tacoma.

Law enforcement agencies routinely have come to depend on Pierce County

Radio Watch to complement their own communications network. And, in recent years, they have expanded their surveillance effort to include traffic reporting for KVI radio in Seattle, helping them to improve their traffic reporting network for listeners throughout Puget Sound.

While many people in Pierce County are not yet aware of the services provided by Radio Watch, the daily lives of thousands are affected daily by the work of this excellent organization.

I recently presented Pierce County Radio Watch with a flag that was flown over the Nation's Capitol in their name. Today, I would like the U.S. House of Representatives to be aware of the excellent 7-year record of this organization during May, Pierce County Radio Watch Month.●

DIVESTITURE NOT NEEDED TO DEVELOP COAL SURPLUSES

HON. JAMES R. JONES

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, as the Congress nears completion of some sort of national energy plan, I wanted to call my colleague's attention to a recent report carried by the news media. The gist of that report was that oil and nuclear fuel energy companies should not be barred from acquiring coal lease properties on the basis of antitrust law.

The study was requested by Congress, and conducted by the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice. According to the study, prohibiting oil and nuclear energy firms from buying coal-bearing properties might actually decrease competition for this new energy resource. The Justice Department found the current coal markets in the United States to be "workably competitive."

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I think this is good news, and for several reasons. First of all, it is reassuring to know that no major abuses of antitrust law seem to be occurring in an area as vital to our economy as energy. Second, I hope this study will serve to balance the on-going discussion as to the nature and desirability of maintaining privately held energy companies. Third, and most importantly, I hope that this report may prove to be the cornerstone of our efforts to increase production of the abundant coal supplies in the country.

Congress can do many things to set national energy policy. We can approve seminars and fund research into coal conversion. We can enact tax breaks or tax penalties to encourage conversion to coal. We can, in short, erect the signposts to point the way to our energy future. We cannot, however, legislate the extraction of coal. Ultimately, this job must fall on the tried and proven shoulders of the free enterprise system.

This Justice Department study seems to suggest that the free enterprise system is working pretty well without Government intervention. If Congress acts like a conservative gardener, and prunes and trims the economy only when necessary, I think we can be assured of a bountiful harvest of energy for future generations.●

THE NATIONAL ENERGY TRUST FUND ACT

HON. CARL D. PURSELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. PURSELL. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing legislation entitled the "National Energy Trust Fund Act" for basically two reasons: Because I have a strong commitment to solving our energy problems, and I do not feel that our leaders are adequately addressing the problems. When I first came to Washington some 18 months ago, I truly believed that the time had come to really deal with our energy problems in substantive terms. We had experienced an "energy crisis" and piecemeal attempts at solving it. We had listened to a great deal of rhetoric, with little action toward implementing the spoken words. But January 1977 saw a new Congress and a new administration which promised to be intent and forthcoming on our energy problems. I looked forward to taking part in this important mission.

We were certainly led to expect great things—and at one point I thought we were on the right track with the creation of a new Department of Energy. However, 18 months later I feel frustrated and disappointed because we are not really any nearer to dealing with our energy problems that we were in January 1977. What has been done? The creation of a new department, yes—but it continues to flounder and is still not fully organized. The energy bill is now over a year old and has not been enacted. Quite frankly, I feel that bill fell so short of our goals that I voted against it. Now, we are presented with "Phase Two" of the energy plan—a memo sent up to Congress 1 day after the budget deadline containing proposals of which 95 percent have already been approved in some form by the House Science and Senate Energy Committees. This is the work of an administration that "declared war" on our energy problems?

Quite frankly, I believe the administration's so-called energy plans are an affront to the American people and fall very short of the type of commitment we must have. It is my firm belief that what this country needs is a strong, national effort in energy, similar to the commitment made to the space program in the 1960's. The space program certainly proved our leadership abilities overall—and the resourcefulness of the congressional committees in particular. Once a strong, cohesive commitment was made to space, the Congress was able to accelerate programs to achieve a major goal—reaching the Moon—in a relatively short period of time.

And in the area of science itself, Americans have proved their resourcefulness again and again. For instance, at one time, all of our tires were made of rubber, imported from Brazil. But now, thanks to our scientists, our tires are now made from synthetics produced in this country. With a commitment to this goal, we were again able to achieve in a relatively short period of time.

When will our leaders not only realize that energy is a No. 1 priority, but act like they realize it, as they did with the space program? At our present rate, we will never be able to accelerate energy development—of any sort—to meet the goals of energy independence. Our economy is dependent to a large extent on a stable energy supply—much of which is now imported. We have no choice but to accelerate our energy program with a goal of energy independence.

To do this, we must work to increase our research and development of nonfossil energy sources. Oil, gas, and coal—from any part of the world—will not last forever. If we do not concentrate our efforts on nonfossil, nonnuclear sources, we will experience the greatest energy crisis ever. This is not a dramatic omen—it is simply a truth which we must face and deal with.

It is with these thoughts that I present the National Energy Trust Fund. The purpose of this bill is very simple—to encourage and conduct a comprehensive national program of basic and applied research and development and technical demonstrations of alternative energy sorces. Furthermore, this bill would seek to promote a partnership between the public and private sectors in terms of energy development—which is vital to all aspects of our economy.

The Secretary of Energy is directed to make loans, contracts, and grants to qualifying individuals and organizations. (Organizations include municipalities, colleges, universities, corporations, and unincorporated businesses.) These financial arrangements would serve to carry out the purposes of this act in terms of alternative energy sources. (Alternative energy sources are defined as nonfossil, nonnuclear (excluding fusion technology) energy sources including (but not limited to) solar power, geothermal energy, and new techniques in the provision and use of hydroelectric energy.)

The trust fund would be funded from the proceeds of any tax heretofore or hereafter imposed specifically to promote energy supply or for energy conservation purposes and then appropriations as necessary. The Secretary of the Treasury would hold the trust fund and report each year to the Congress on its fiscal condition. The Secretary would be able to invest any funds which were not necessary for withdrawals for energy purposes.

Furthermore, the funding in this bill is increased in incremental steps, and then decreased in later years to further encourage energy independence. Our purpose is to accelerate research and development in alternative energy with a space program type of commitment, to reach our goal of energy independence in a relatively short period of time.

I cannot emphasize enough the absolute need for a strong, cohesive commitment to alternative sources of energy. Without such an effort—of which we are certainly capable—we will never see the end of our energy problems.

I urge my colleagues to consider the seriousness of this problem, and hope that they will join me in this effort to prepare our country for energy independence as we prepared America for the journey to the Moon.●

THE HARRIS SURVEY

HON. THOMAS J. DOWNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Speaker, according to a recent Harris survey, a massive majority of Americans favor the United States and the Soviet Union coming to a new SALT agreement that would limit the number of nuclear missiles each country can deploy. Mr. Harris found a 75 to 12 percent majority favoring this position in a poll released on May 22, 1978.

This survey is significant because it should encourage our negotiators to press forward at this time with the knowledge that there is a sizable domestic constituency which will work for ratification of a satisfactory agreement.

The survey also found that there is a 74 to 17 percent majority in favor of both countries ending all nuclear testing, which is in line with the decision of the Carter administration to seek a comprehensive test ban treaty with the Soviet Union.

Since this poll gives valuable insights into the current thinking of Americans on relations with the Soviet Union, I ask that it be inserted in the RECORD for the consideration of my colleagues.

The text of the poll follows:

[From the Chicago Tribune, May 22, 1978]

THE HARRIS SURVEY

(By Louis Harris)

Reports that the American people have turned less favorable toward detente and have cooled on their desire to see the United States and the Soviet Union agree on strategic arms limitations simply have no basis in fact. To the contrary, there appear to be sizable majorities of the public who deeply hope agreements between the world's two leading superpowers can be achieved.

Despite rather widespread claims to the contrary, a recent Harris Survey of 1,563 adults nationwide has found:

A 71–15 percent majority favors "detente—that is, the United States and Russia seeking out areas of agreement and cooperation." A year ago a slightly higher 75–10 percent majority supported detente, while in 1976 a 73–16 percent majority held the same view. By any standard, support for arriving at key agreements between the two countries is substantial and overwhelming.

Specifically a 75–12 percent majority favors the U.S. and Russia coming to a new SALT arms control agreement that would limit the number of nuclear warheads and missiles they can deploy. Just a year ago, the margin was 66–8 percent. In the past 14 months, backing for SALT has gone up 9 points. Recently, Secretary of State Cyrus Vance and chief arms negotiator Paul Warnke reported that real progress had been made on SALT negotiations and that final agreement might be only a matter of weeks away. It has been suggested that Soviet Chairman Leonid Brezhnev might well be invited to visit President Carter in Washington this summer for a summit meeting, at which new SALT agreements would be announced.

On three other key areas of potential agreement, massive majorities are favorable:

On "increasing trade between the U.S. and Russia," a 70–18 percent majority nationwide register their approval, up slightly from the 66–16 percent majority who felt the same way in 1977.

An agreement between the U.S. and Soviet Union to "end all nuclear weapons testing" meets with 74–17 percent approval by the public. A year ago, a slightly larger 75–12 percent majority favored such an agreement.

By 63–21 percent, a sizable majority also favors the U.S. granting Russia "the same trading rights with us as most other nations have." This would mean giving the Soviets the "most favored nation" rights enjoyed by other countries with whom we conduct trade.

It is clear from these findings that there is still a favorable climate for détente in this country. Large majorities feel that in a nuclear era, confrontations between the two leading nations in the world must be avoided. This means finding areas of agreement which might then ease tensions.

At the same time, according to recent Harris Surveys, the American people are uneasy about Soviet and Cuban military activities in Africa as well as about violations of human rights within the Soviet Union. And they seem to feel that the U.S. should not hesitate to make forceful representations to the Kremlin on these matters.

What they do not want, however, is to have the progress of the SALT talks and the prospects for increased trade linked too closely with these other issues. The public believes that a policy of pluralism must be a cornerstone of U.S.-Soviet relations in this advanced nuclear age.

For the Carter administration, agreements on SALT and trade with the Russians could well turn around the dismal 63–29 percent negative ratings that the public has given the President on his conduct of foreign policy. At the heart of this judgment is people's feeling that President Carter has not handled relations with Russia very well. Indeed, they give him a lower rating on this score than any President in the last 15 years.

What a solid majority wants to see is progress in negotiations, patiently and effectively worked out, with no danger to America's security. And that objective can be achieved, in the minds of a 71–15 percent majority, by pursuing the policy of detente.

TABLES

Between April 29 and May 6, the Harris Survey asked a cross-section of 1,563 adults nationwide in in-person interviews:

THE ECONOMICS OF GUNS AND NODULES: WHY WE NEED A DEEP SEA MINING BILL

HON. JOHN B. BREAUX

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, the deep seabed mining issue has echoed in the halls of Congress for many years. In the past, however, the administration has viewed each session of the continuing United Nations Law of the Sea (LOS) Conference with optimism and has not supported domestic deep sea mining legislation for fear that it might disrupt negotiations perceived to be delicate.

Last year, at the start of the sixth session of the LOS Conference, the administration began to change its position. For the first time the folks downtown began to recognize the need to move forward with domestic legislation. The head of the U.S. delegation at the LOS, Ambassador Elliot Richardson, has stated that the proceedings at the Conference which have entered into its second decade of negotiations should not deter the progress of domestic legislation. As a result of the willingness of the executive branch to work with the Congress on this issue, many of the questions which have surrounded deep seabed mining in the past have been worked out. The product of these efforts is H.R. 3350 which will be brought before the House next month.

I have always maintained that a sound and equitable LOS treaty is preferable to any form of unilateral action taken by the United States to encourage the development of deep seabed mining. This view is reflected by the interim nature of H.R. 3350.

However, I also believe that if a treaty cannot be obtained, the United States cannot afford to wait and allow our technological lead to dwindle and at the same time subject ourselves to serious economic disruptions in our supplies of strategic minerals.

Although experts generally agree that the threat of long-term cartelization of the nickel, copper, cobalt, and manganese markets is minimal, I stated my concerns last year that the possible adverse effects of short-term disruptions in supply had not been satisfactorily dispelled. Unfortunately my statement of last year has been substantiated by recent events, a description of which follows.

During the second week in March, rebel forces began what turned out to be a well planned and executed assault on Zaire's copper-rich Shaba Province. This campaign culminated in the shutdown of more than 75 percent of Zaire's annual copper production and 90 percent of that country's cobalt production capacity. According to the Washington Post, the rebel forces, which are now purportedly retreating into Angola, succeeded in rendering Zaire's Shaba Province mines inoperative for a period of at least 6 months to several years.

The repercussions emanating from the recent turn of events in Zaire will be felt, not only in that country and region of the world, but internationally for months and possibly years to come.

By cutting the main artery supplying Zaire's economic blood, the rebels effectively imposed a major economic setback to a nation which is struggling to meet its massive foreign debt obligations. Internationally, the termination of mining operations in the Shaba Province has already begun to affect the world price of these strategically important metals.

The financial section of the Washington Post has provided an alarming chronicle of the impact the conflict in Zaire has had on the world price of copper:

On May 15, 1978, news of the rebel invasion into the mining district of Zaire caused copper prices to increase a cent per pound—to 59.20 cents/lb.

On May 17, 1978, the Zairian conflict triggered a wave of speculative demand which caused copper prices to jump by 0.7 to 0.8 cents per pound.

The following day (May 18) copper prices advanced 1.0 to 1.4 cents a pound, finishing at 60.90 cents/lb.

On May 19, 1978, the Washington Post reported: "the rebel invasion of copper-rich Zaire triggered heavy speculative demand that lifted copper futures on New York's Commodity Exchange (Comex) about 2.5 cents per pound."

According to the Washington Post, on May 22: "Reports that rebels had flooded copper mines during hostilities in Zaire stimulated another wave of speculative buying yesterday that inflated the prices of those futures."

"Mining engineers and technicians fleeing the African nation told reporters that even if they returned to work, it could be six months before the mines were operational."

"Copper futures, accordingly, jumped nearly a cent a pound on top of a 2.5 cent price hike last week."

On May 25, copper prices increased by 2.5 cents per pound in the wake of news verifying the forced reduction in Zaire's copper production. The spot contract on New York's Comex finished at 64.40 cents per pound compared to the quoted price for copper of 58.00 cents per pound on April 28.

In 1976, Zaire's cobalt production accounted for 51 percent of total world production. Cobalt is normally produced as a byproduct of nickel and copper ore production and processing. Nickel and copper markets have been depressed lately due to low prices for these metals. Consequently, production of these two metals has been cut back. Demand for cobalt was high during the first quarter of 1978, and reached an all time high in March. The combined effects of high demand and decreased production has precipitated a severe world shortage of cobalt.

As of May, African Metals Corp., one of the world's largest suppliers of cobalt, announced a rationing program whereby its customers would receive only 70 percent of their contracted supply allocation. As a result, while the posted price for cobalt (the price paid by African Metals Corp. customers under contract) has remained at $6.85 per pound, the free market price for cobalt began to soar in late April to $18 and $20 per pound.

Since the United States is totally dependent on foreign sources of cobalt, the price trends for cobalt in this decade are especially disconcerting. In 1972, cobalt was selling for $2.45 per pound. The price steadily increased to $3.75 per pound in 1974, $4.90 per pound in 1976, to the current price of $20 per pound. Based on the current market price, the price of cobalt has increased an incredible 716 percent in 6 years.

Cobalt is critical to the United States from both strategic and economic standpoint. It is an essential element in many alloys and superalloys. Cobalt is especially important in electrical and aerospace industries.

In 1974, according to the Congressional Research Service, 83 percent of the United States cobalt imports originated in Zaire. The Department of the Interior stated that as of March of this year, consumer stockpiles of cobalt in the United States would meet only 2 months of this country's current consumption.

The prospect of major shortages of cobalt in this country is significant given the fact that Zaire's cobalt production could be deferred for 1 year. The fact that a worldwide shortage existed before the disruption of mining operations in Kolwezi, which accounts for 46 percent of the world's production of cobalt, can only mean that the price of cobalt will continue to rise.

The tragic events in Zaire provide a painful exposure of the vulnerability of the United States to supply disruptions in certain raw material markets. Other strategically and economically critical metals in this category include nickel and manganese of which 71 percent and 100 percent, respectively, of our annual consumption must be imported.

For the United States, there exists an alternative to this extremely dangerous one-sided trade situation. The solution lies on the bottom of the deep ocean. Scattered across the seabed throughout the world's oceans are potato-sized accretions which contain an estimated $3 trillion worth of nickel, copper, and manganese.

Private corporations in this country and in other industrialized nations have expressed an interest in mining these manganese nodules.

According to some estimates, by mining these nodules U.S. companies could meet all of our country's demand for cobalt and manganese by the year 1990.

What this means for the United States is a stable supply of these critical metals, a decreased balance of payments deficit (imports of nickel, copper, cobalt, and manganese contributed $1.5 billion to our payments deficit in 1976), and increased stability in the world market for these metals. Stable prices, as Secretary of Commerce Juanita Kreps recognized in testimony before the Oceanography Subcommittee, will derive benefits for the international community as well as the United States.

Currently pending in the House is a bill, H.R. 3350. This bill would authorize U.S. companies to engage in mining of manganese nodules on the sea floor beyond the limits of national jurisdiction. The companies have the technology to proceed. What they need now is an interim legal framework under which they can continue expenditures and begin commercial recovery prior to the final resolution of a U.N. Law of the Sea Conference. The warnings of economic analysts have gone unheeded for too long. These warnings have now become realities. It is time for the Congress to act on this important legislation when it comes to the floor later this month.●

CRIMINAL CODE REFORM

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, last January the Senate passed a massive, 682-page criminal code reform bill and the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Criminal Justice is now trying to weed through this complex legislation. The Senate version of the bill represents a tremendous expansion of the Federal Government's criminal jurisdiction at the expense of civil liberties. The following Los Angeles Times editorial explains the need for caution in drafting the House version of this important legislation. In its haste, the Senate allowed intrusions upon many individual and first amendment rights which are crucial to our democratic society. The editorial points out that the balance between State and Federal power will be dangerously tipped toward the side of the Federal Government if the Senate's Criminal Code bill becomes law. I recommend to my colleagues this thoughtfully written editorial which clarifies many of the faults of the Senate-passed bill:

[From the Los Angeles Times, May 24, 1978]

A LEAP IN THE DARK

Legislation to codify, revise and reform federal criminal law (S. 1437, passed by the Senate, and H.R. 6869, now under consideration by the House of Representatives) has encountered a setback in the House judiciary subcommittee.

After 23 days of hearings, the subcommittee balked at the complexity of the massive, 682-page measure. Rep. Henry J. Hyde (R-Ill.), summed up the committee's sentiment by calling the bill "a giant leap in the dark." Another committee member, Rep. Charles E. Wiggins (R-Calif.), says the House must take a long and independent look at reform, and not simply ratify the Senate action.

Supporters of the legislation proceeded immediately to the attack, but their arguments, instead of adding strength to their cause, became impressive new evidence that the code should be defeated.

The Washington Post prefaced its renewed support of the code with this confession: "It is almost impossible for anyone, other than the (Justice Department) lawyers who have lived with it for a decade, to comprehend all of the changes this proposed code would make in federal criminal law." Yet, from that admission, the newspaper went on to argue for passage of a bill that it finds almost incomprehensible.

The New York Times attacked the House subcommittee's analysis as "a cop-out on crime," an evaluation that reduces a momentous issue to a trivial level. The present form of the revision of federal criminal law would profoundly alter the relationship between the federal government and the states, and between the American people and the federal government.

Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.), who opposes the legislation, says it would "tip the delicate balance of police power in our nation too much in the direction of the federal government." That observation was a diplomatic attempt to state a hard truth in soft terms.

The code represents a massive invasion of federal criminal power into areas traditionally left to the states. In testimony before the House subcommittee, Prof. John Quigley of Ohio State Law School estimated that, under the bill, the annual criminal caseload of federal courts, now numbering 40,000, would increase more than five times. This would bring about a tremendous expansion in the apparatus of the federal criminal-justice system, including the FBI.

The significance of this vast extension of federal jurisdiction would be difficult to exaggerate. No longer would there be a "delicate balance" between state and federal police authority. Federal power would predominate.

In most fundamental way, the proposed code would reverse the relationship between government and American citizens. In our democracy, through the First Amendment that guarantees freedom of information, the government is kept under the watchful eye of the people. Under the code, as approved by the Senate, the government would become the watchful censor over the political activities of the people.

How did this come about in a measure that began as a well-intended effort by a national commission to rationalize a jumble of federal laws accumulated over nearly 200 years?

The commission's work started under President Lyndon B. Johnson's administration, fell into the hands of Richard M. Nixon's administration, which was dominated, even during the peak of its power after the 1972 election, by a siege mentality.

What emerged was legislation that was authoritarian in tone and substance, and whose guiding principle was the implicit assertion of the need to protect the government from its domestic enemies—the people.

During the uproar over Watergate, the proposed code, like nearly everything else, was overtaken and submerged in the news of the dramatic, day-by-day developments that finally led to the ouster of President Nixon. But the legislation, which escaped the attention of most of the public, was not forgotten by its sponsors, nor by the Justice Department's team of lawyers who drafted the bill.

When the measure surfaced, as Senate Bill 1 in Gerald R. Ford's administration, the public finally became aware of its significance. Even proponents of the S 1 version have now admitted that it was an atrocity. It would have whittled away First Amendment freedoms, undercut Fifth Amendment protections and, in sum, enhanced the power of government, and diminished America's system of individual rights. It would have enabled the government to insulate itself from effective political criticism.

Yet a reform of the criminal code, a tedious task involving the rewriting and codifying of some 3,000 criminal offenses, was an appealing idea. Everybody agreed that, if not imperative, the revision of the code was worthwhile.

After the disaster of S 1, an immediate salvage effort was launched, with the technical assistance of the Justice Department squad that had continued to draft and redraft the bill through three administrations.

What finally emerged was S 1437 in the Senate and the companion bill in the House, and the new measure was hailed as a "masterful compromise" between liberal and conservative senators who otherwise could not agree on the time of day.

The compromise does represent an advance over S 1, but if the new version had been drafted in the dark it hardly could have failed to be an improvement over its predecessor, which was a carefully designed assault on dividual freedoms.

Several improvements in the current draft should be noted.

Judges would be barred from prosecuting a news organization for violating a court-issued gag order, if the order subsequently were held unconstitutional. As the situation now stands, a news reporter can be punished for violating an order that is later declared invalid.

The so-called Nuremberg defense for public officials accused of law violations has been dropped. The old bill would have allowed them the defense of claiming that their lawless actions were committed in behalf of national security.

The new version would repeal the Smith Act, which made it a criminal offense to talk about the overthrow of the government by force.

Such gains, and some others, are not to be minimized, but to say that these changes justify enacting this legislation is to overlook numerous other statutes that lay a heavy burden on all forms of political expression.

Thomas I. Emerson, professor emeritus, Yale law school, comes to the conclusion that this bill "retains a large number of provisions which individually and in totality are gravely detrimental to the American system of individual rights."

Though enumerating them may be somewhat less exciting than reviewing a Rapid Transit District bus schedule, they demand close study because they give the government widely expanded power over the actions of American citizens.

Section 1301 (Obstructing a Government Function by Fraud) could be used by the government to impose censorship on government information. It would be a bar to prosecution that the "offense was committed solely for the purpose of disseminating information to the public." But the use of the word "solely" would virtually wipe out the protection if a jury could detect the presence of any other motive.

Section 1311 (Hindering Law Enforcement) would provide that a person was guilty of an offense if he "interferes with, hinders, delays or prevents the discovery, apprehension" of a person charged with a crime "by engaging in conduct by which he knowingly conceals the other person or his identity." This provision could be used against a news reporter who refused to disclose his files to the government, or destroyed them to protect a confidential source.

Section 1331 (Criminal Contempt) would create an offense of not only disobeying a court order but "resisting" such an order. This term could be interpreted to include mere speech. News organizations would be exempt under certain conditions, as we noted, but other worms of expression would be subject to the authority of a judge.

There are many other aspects in this massive revision of criminal law that reflect the legacy of the Nixon years.

Section 1343 (Making a False Statement) says that a person is guilty of a crime if, "in a government matter," he knowingly makes "a material oral statement that is false" to a law-enforcement officer or to an official assigned "investigative responsibility." A mere disagreement between a citizen and a law-enforcement agent could subject the citizen to federal prosecution, and the outcome could depend on one man's word against another. Moreover, the offense would extend beyond a statement of fact, because it would include "a declaration of representation of opinion, belief or other state of mind."

Present law on false oral statements generally has been limited to false statements in the content of a quasijudicial proceeding, or in a situation where one person falsely tried to implicate another in a crime.

Several sections of the code would impose greater control on the flow of information from inside the government to the public. While national-security matters have to be guarded, and some information affecting the privacy of individuals should be protected, a democracy thrives on information, and withers when information is cut off.

The sweep and magnitude of the proposed reform is ominously impressive. If the code is approved in its present form, the weight of federal criminal law will be felt in every corner of the land.

Section 1831, for example, would extend federal jurisdiction over riots to any incident involving the movement of a person across state lines. A "riot" is defined as a public disturbance that includes as few as 10 persons. As one critic has said, the code would come close to converting the federal judiciary into courts of general criminal jurisdiction.

The reform of the entire body of federal criminal law is a logical approach—on paper. In reality, it is not. It is just too vast, too complicated for Congress to swallow at one time.

When the bill was perfunctorily debated a few months ago in the Senate, Sen. James B. Allen (D-Ala.) said, "There aren't five senators . . . who have any idea what's going on . . . ." Sen. James A. McClure (R-Ida.) said the legislation had "become a law unto itself, a massive re-creation whose full implications are known only by its prosecutorial draftsmen (in the Justice Department) . . . ."

The cautious position taken by Rep. James R. Mann (D-S.C.), the chairman of the House Judiciary subcommittee, is fully justified. He wants to limit his committee's work to the consideration of obsolete laws and some improvements in sentencing procedures.

Step by cautious step is the way to proceed on legislation that goes to the heart of our system of justice and affects the fundamental freedoms of the American people.●

GREGORY WITTINE: UNPARALLELED COURAGE AND DETERMINATION

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues a record of personal courage and determination in overcoming handicaps that is unparalleled in my experience. It is the record of Gregory J. Wittine, 22, of Baldwin, Nassau County, N.Y., who, on June 9 will receive the Eagle Scout award in a Court of Honor convened at the Cerebral Palsy Treatment and Rehabilitation Center, Roosevelt, N.Y.

We all know the rank of Eagle Scout is not easy to attain. Only 1 percent of all the millions of boys who enter scouting achieve that pinnacle of scouting. But Gregory Wittine faced even greater odds. He is so severely afflicted with cerebral palsy that he is unable to speak or walk, and has very limited use of his hands. He can communicate with others only by using an alphabet board on which he points to letters, laboriously spelling out his thoughts, letter by letter. To move about he must use a wheel chair.

You might well wonder how anyone with Gregg's handicap could dare to even think about winning the Eagle Scout award. But not only did Greg dream that impossible dream—with an unconquerable spirit of determination and perseverance, he set out to achieve that goal. From the time he entered scouting, Greg was sure that he would one day be an Eagle Scout.

Slowly, but methodically, he worked his way up through the ranks as a Tenderfoot, Second Class, First Class, Star Scout, and Life Scout. Each rank was achieved through effort and patience that would seem insurmountable to the average person. Because of his handicap, each step took far longer than usual. But the attainment of each higher rank only spurred Greg on to the challenge of realizing his goal to be an Eagle Scout.

Some of those challenges were unbelievably difficult. One merit badge Greg earned, for instance, required him to hike 10 miles. Greg crawled for 1 mile on his hands and knees, and was only persuaded to get back to his wheelchair after his knees were badly cut and bruised. Then he wheeled himself the remaining 9 miles.

When merit badges involved tests of knowledge, Greg spelled out his answers letter by letter on his alphabet board. Each merit badge required extra time and effort on Greg's part. But no matter how difficult the task, Greg held to his impossible dream. He never gave up. Merit badge by merit badge, Greg continued to climb higher in scouting ranks. Then came the magic moment. Greg won his 24th merit badge, and won approval from the District Council's Eagle Scout Review Board. He was told he had realized his dream, and would be awarded the Eagle Scout rank.

Then, a final obstacle appeared unexpectedly which almost dashed Greg's hopes. The National Boy Scout Council at North Brunswick, N.J., refused to approve the award. The council acknowledged that Greg had met all the requirements, save one. The council said its rules permitted only those who had not reached the age of 18 to become Eagle Scouts. Greg was now 22.

The decision outraged Greg's many supporters and friends. His Scoutmaster Richard Golden, members of the Merroque District Eaglescout Review Board, Bernard Greenbaum and Max Kleinman, Senators and Members of Congress, were among those who deluged the National Scout Council with letters demanding reconsideration of Greg's case. The national press picked up the story. Early in May, the Boy Scout National Executive Committee met and decided to change its rules to permit persons with severe physical handicap to remain in Scouting past the age of 18, and to continue to advance in rank past that age if other qualifications were met. Furthermore, the committee made the rules change retroactive, so that Gregory Wittine could become an Eagle Scout. And on June 9, Greg will receive his long-sought award.

But in the minds of his friends and supporters, Gregory Wittine has achieved far more than the rank of Eagle Scout, impressive as that personal honor is. He has won a significant national recognition for the abilities of the severely handicapped. And, perhaps his greatest achievement, Greg has given each of us an invaluable example of the inexhaustible possibilities of human accomplishment, if only we have the desire, the courage, and the will to persevere.

Mr. Speaker, I will long remember the answer Greg gave when asked by a reporter what message he might have for others who have dreams, but face severe obstacles in achieving them. Slowly, letter by letter, Greg spelled out, "Keep Trying."

Mr. Speaker, we owe Gregory Wittine a debt of gratitude for the way he kept trying, and in so doing provided all of us with a shining example of the possibilities that lie within reach of the unconquerable human spirit. An example so compelling that it helped persuade the National Boy Scout Council to change its rules so that other handicapped Scouts will be encouraged in their efforts to follow the very difficult path Greg blazed for them.●

MOROZ: NO LAWBREAKER

HON. JOSHUA EILBERG

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to report to my colleagues on a recent project in Philadelphia which demonstrates how various parts of our community can work together to successfully focus public attention on the denial of human rights abroad.

Several weeks ago, members of the Ukrainian community in Philadelphia staged a march to honor Valentyn Moroz, who has spent the past 13 years in a Soviet prison because he challenged the authority of the Soviet system by campaigning for Ukrainian rights.

The Philadelphia march was important not only because it expressed support for a courageous man who symbolizes man's hope for freedom; it was important also because it was the latest of several examples of Ukrainian-Jewish cooperation on the issue of human rights.

A recent commentary in the Philadelphia Bulletin explains the significance of this action. I commend the following article to the attention of my colleagues. It is an excellent description of how the people of Philadelphia are working together to remind all of us of our obligation to speak out whenever human rights are trampled.

UKRAINIANS ON THE MARCH

(By Rosamunde Ginsburg)

Although it will take weeks before news of it reaches Valentyn Moroz via the grapevine in the Soviet Union's Mordovia Labor Camp, the Philadelphia Ukrainian community will celebrate his 42nd birthday tomorrow. The Committee for the Defense of Valentyn Moroz, a Ukrainian historian and political prisoner, plans a parade in his honor that will begin at 2 P.M. at Independence Hall and end at the Art Museum.

Moroz is no lawbreaker as we know the term. Yet he has been behind bars for the past 13 years, except for nine months between his first and second convictions. Nor is he a violent person who might harm himself or others. Yet he was a "patient" for almost two of those 13 years at the Serbsky Institute of Forensic Psychiatry. This is in line with Russia's policy of declaring its dissidents insane and sentencing them to indefinite terms at such institutions.

Moroz' first arrest was for having in his possession underground literature and Soviet-banned foreign publications. The second was for writing essays decrying the arbitrary nature of Soviet law and the Kremlin-directed destruction of Ukrainian culture.

In jail at the notorious Vladimir Prison, Moroz developed serious illnesses, was drugged and was given food contaminated with chemicals. There, also, he was badly hurt in an attack by other prisoners and later placed in solitary confinement for almost two years. He then undertook a four-and-a-half month hunger strike, trying to persuade the authorities to transfer him to a labor camp. They did so only after remanding him to the psychiatric hospital for nearly two years.

Defense Committee Chairperson Ulana Mazurkevich says, "We hope that all of the pressures we are bringing to bear, of which the parade is just one, will help Moroz gain his freedom. Making him a thorn in the side of the USSR just might hasten his release."

Ms. Mazurkevich recently returned from Washington where she met with Senators Richard Schweiker (R-Pa.) and Henry Jackson (D-Wash.), who have promised to write to Moroz pledging their support.

"Another aim," she emphasized, "is to call attention to the thousands of other political prisoners in the USSR." According to Soviet dissidents, at least 50 percent of these are Ukrainian. The reason for this disproportionately high number, they feel, is that Moscow is trying to eradicate the nationalist, or separatist, movement in the Ukraine.

This desire for self-determination goes back 300 years. Events such as the death-by-starvation of millions during the government-created famine of the 1930s served to intensify this yearning. The killing of Ukrainian culture—ethnocide—is far more subtle and continues to this day.

Saturday's parade is receiving support from members of the Jewish community. The Interreligious Task Force on Soviet Jewry has adopted the non-Jewish Moroz as one of its "prisoners of conscience" for whom it has special concern.

This is significant in light of the fact that, historically, there has been anti-Semitism in the Ukraine. But, according to the Ukrainian Held, an underground journal written there, "Ukrainian Nationalism has not only purged itself of any such taint, but has actually come to regard the Jewish population with special friendship, as fellow-sufferers from the same oppression." Witness the trial of the Jewish doctor, Mikhail Shtern, against whom two thousand of his Ukrainian neighbors refused to testify and whose ultimate release they helped to secure. There is now cooperation between the two nationalities even though their goals are different.

The Jews want to leave the USSR. With this, the Russians have less of a problem because there is no homeland within their borders for Jews. (Even so, they have allowed only about 140,000 to emigrate since 1970.) With the Ukrainians, it is a different story. To allow secession and the formation of an independent nation, even though this is "guaranteed" by Article 72 of the Soviet constitution, would threaten the leadership with intolerable internal dissent.

So, Valentyn Moroz, a symbol of the Ukrainian separatist movement, becomes also the symbol of a new alliance between two peoples that have forged their collective zeal and resources into a weapon of heightened effectiveness. It is another triumph for the cause of human rights.●

PROPERTY TAXES

HON. JOHN H. ROUSSELOT

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, many of my colleagues in the House of Representatives have let me know that they are very much aware that there is a hotly debated tax measure on California's June 6 primary ballot. This measure, the Jarvis-Gann initiative, would limit property taxes to 1 percent of market value and require a two-thirds vote of both houses of the State legislature for new taxes. Jarvis-Gann would restrain increases in State spending and make it difficult to raise tax rates.

We have States in our Union that operate with low tax rates. An article which appeared in the May 25 edition of the Wall Street Journal describes the growing attraction of the State of New Hampshire, which manages its affairs without an income or sales tax. They do not provide all the services that are found in big spending States, but many have found that they are better off without these Government programs. The article tells about a Californian who moved his family to New Hampshire and figures he is saving thousands of dollars, because of the lack of a State sales and income tax. New Hampshire may very well be, as its Governor describes it:

. . . one of the last strongholds of the free enterprise system.

With the passage of Jarvis-Gann, Californians may decide to follow in the footsteps of New Hampshire.

I commend this article to the attention of my colleagues:

NORTHERN NIRVANA—"NEW" NEW HAMPSHIRE FINDS THAT LOW TAXES HELP TO FUEL ECONOMY

(By David Gumpert)

MERRIMACK, N.H.—Until a year ago, Richard Hale was enjoying the California good life. The 40-year-old executive lived with his wife and two children in a nine-room hillside house, surrounded by a dozen varieties of fruit trees, outside San Jose. During his free time, he sailed in San Francisco Bay.

But after 13 years in California, the good life wore thin. Growing congestion was making it "increasingly difficult to commune with nature," Mr. Hale says.

So a year ago, when he got an offer to help run a microwave-parts company in southern New Hampshire somewhat larger than a similar firm he was running in California, he grabbed it. He hasn't been disappointed. Mr. Hale bought the same size house he had in California for half the proceeds of his old house. And he figures he is saving thousands of dollars annually because New Hampshire has neither the income tax ncr the sales tax California has.

Mr. Hale continues to sail during the summer, and he has taken up ice boating in the winter. The Merrimack area, he observes, seems "very similar to San Jose 10 to 15 year sago." Even if he wanted to return West, he says, "I'd probably have difficulty getting my family back to California."

NORTHERN "SUN BELT"

Not too long ago, comparing California and New Hampshire would have seemed preposterous. Yet today, apart from the obvious differences in size and climate, New Hampshire appears to many to be offering attractions similar to those California once offered. And it is experiencing a boom similar to that in some Sun Belt states.

In the last five years, 225 companies either have opened their first plants in the state or have moved their corporate headquarters here, creating more than 14,000 jobs. Many companies have come from neighboring Massachusetts; others have come from farther away. As one prominent example, in 1974, Wheelabrator-Frye Inc., a maker of engineering and specialty products, with annual revenues of $482 million, moved its corporate headquarters to Hampton, N.H., from New York.

The new firms have helped fuel a population spurt that has made New Hampshire one of the nation's fastest-growing states. Since 1970, the state's population has increased by 15%, more than double the 6.4% national rate and even more than California's 9.6%. The Grancite State's population growth has been exceeded by a few Sun Belt and Mountain states, but east of the Mississippi River only Florida has grown faster. Those who have come here have had little trouble finding work because New Hampshire's unemployment rate hovers around an enviable 3%.

THE PRICE OF GROWTH

But a growing and increasingly vocal minority in the state is contending that New Hampshire is paying a steep price for its fast growth. These critics argue that because the state has neither an income nor a sales tax (it is the only state to lack both), it can't provide the social services taken for granted elsewhere. For instance, the state ranks 50th in its per-capita contribution to education; thus, schools don't have kindergartens and parents of handicapped children must pay much of their children's education costs. Nor does the state operate a law school or a medical school.

But Gov. Meldrim Thomson, Jr., has little sympathy with those who would like to see the state doing more. "We have too many in the legislature who don't want to run the state as a business but as a charitable institution," he says.

Certainly, New Hampshire would appear to be a well-run "business." It has balanced books and is the only state in New England with a Moody's triple-A bond rating. State revenues come mainly from an 8% business profits tax and from levies on liquor, cigarets and horse racing. State-owned liquor stores have the region's lowest prices and are purposely located near neighboring state borders.

"There's a lot of attraction up there," says James Howell, chief economist for First National Bank of Boston. And Keith Wheelock, president of Fantus Co., a corporate consulting firm, credits New Hampshire with being "aggressive in taking advantage of its assets."

The bulk of growth has occurred in New Hampshire's southernmost section, which is convenient to Boston and to scenic mountain and ocean areas. This area, known locally as the "golden triangle," is bounded by Salem and Nashua in the south and Manchester in the north. Although it contains under 4% of the state's land area, it has more than 30% of the state's 849,000 people and is becoming something of a boom area.

PLANTS ON A HANDSHAKE

Housing prices have soared. Motel rooms during the week are nearly impossible to get without making reservations weeks in advance. The area's leading industrial developer, Samuel Tamposi, builds plants and office buildings for customers "on a handshake." He says confidently, "If they won't take (the plants), someone else will."

This expansion has come despite an exodus since World War II of the textile and shoe and leather firms that once formed much of New England's industrial base. As recently as 1968, shoe and leather companies employed 20,000 New Hampshire workers. Now they employ only about 11,000.

The state has more than made up these losses by attracting computer, electronics and other high-technology companies. The first substantial success in attracting new business came in 1971 when New Hampshire eliminated its cumbersome tax on inventories and machinery and equipment and substituted the flat tax on net operating profits. The new levy gave New Hampshire "an element of tax certainty" that it didn't have before, says Paul Guilderson, director of the state's industrial development office.

New businesses also have been attracted to New Hampshire because the state's corporate atmosphere is so hospitable. There is no land-use law as in neighboring Vermont, and a pro-business attitude is fostered by the state's two most influential public figures, Gov. Thomson and William Loeb, publisher of the Manchester Union Leader, the only state-wide paper in New Hampshire.

Gov. Thomson says he works hard at personally trying to persuade businessmen to relocate in New Hampshire. Once they arrive, he says, he tries to make them feel comfortable. "I'm as busy cutting ribbons as many politicians are kissing babies," he says.

Indeed, as Gov. Thomson sees it, New Hampshire is an island of stability in a sea of turbulence. "We may be one of the last strongholds of the free enterprise system," he says. "New Hampshire is what America was." He fights hard to maintain the status quo: When a couple covered up the state's official motto, "Live free or die," on their auto license plates, he unsuccessfully fought them up to the U.S. Supreme Court.

But the governor's critics maintain that his fiscal conservatism is false economy. One result of not having sales or income taxes is a heavy property-tax burden. The bulk of education costs and costs normally assumed by states, such as judges' salaries, financing of nursing homes for the indigent and certain welfare payments, come from property taxes.

"We have a mythology in New Hampshire that because we don't have an income or sales tax, it's cheaper to live here," says George B. Roberts, a Republican who is speaker of the state's house of representatives. He argues that if the state were providing services that most other states provide, its annual budget would be about 50% larger than the current $528 million. "The social costs for things not done in New Hampshire have yet to be reaped," he warns.

Recently, the state has been taken to task for allegedly neglecting problems. A study done for the state legislature earlier this year argued that New Hampshire has probably identified only half the handicapped children "that would be expected on the basis of most research on the prevalence of handicapping conditions." And a class action suit was filed in February in a U.S. district court in Concord charging that children who have been identified as handicapped aren't getting the financial aid they are entitled to for special education.

The state and local communities also are charged with repeatedly trying to wriggle out of making legitimate welfare payments. New Hampshire legal-aid lawyers have filed at least 10 suits in federal court and countless others in state courts over the past four years to obtain welfare payments for indigent residents, says Charles Burkam, director of community education for the legal-aid service.

SCHOOL SCORES CITED

Gov. Thomson defends the state's current approach to services. He contends that the state's low education contribution is "good" because it means local community contributions are most crucial and "people are more apt to watch their money when it's spent closer to home." As evidence that his state's education system is working well, he points to a recent survey of scholastic-aptitude test results that showed New Hampshire students with higher scores than both the New England and the national averages.

Besides such spending issues, there also has been mounting concern around the state that perhaps the growth is happening too fast. Several dozen towns in southern New Hampshire have enacted ordinances designed to limit new housing construction in an effort to stave off service and budget demands.

Some businessmen are beginning to grumble that with the unemployment rate so low, they can't find the skilled labor they need and turnover is too high. For example, Centronics Data Computer Corp., a maker of computer printers, says its turnover has doubled to more than 30% annually since the company was founded in Hudson, N.H., nine years ago. "Almost anyone who works for us can have another job within 24 hours," says Robert Howard, president. "It's a very unhealthy situation for us and other companies."

State industrial-development officials say they are pushing hard to persuade out-of-state businesses wishing to relocate in New Hampshire to go north of the golden triangle. Also, at least three committees have been established in recent months, one by the governor, another by the legislature and a third by businessmen and civic leaders, to more closely monitor and possibly regulate the fast growth. "We realize we have a good thing going, and we want to keep it," says John Sununu, chairman of a governor's committee on New Hampshire's future.

TAKING THE PLEDGE

But changes in New Hampshire's way of doing things seem unlikely in the near future. Gov. Thomson, a Republican, is expected to run for reelection in the fall. Two Democrats who are challenging him already have "taken the pledge," political shorthand for promising not to propose new taxes. And a state official says he doesn't anticipate any regulation of the state's growth because "the primary thrust has been for local control."

To many executives who have relocated companies and plants in New Hampshire, the state is fine the way it is and certainly a big improvement over previous locations. Take Kollsman Instrument Co., a Sun Chemical Co. division that makes altimeters. For most of the early 1970s the company operated on Long Island, N.Y., at break-even point or a loss. High union wage rates and cumbersome union rules that hurt productivity were a big drain on finances, says Fred Gagnon, Kollsman's general manager.

In 1975, Kollsman closed its Long Island operations and moved to Merrimack, N.H. Today, without a union to contend with, wages are 17% to 18% lower than on Long Island, and productivity is "nearly double what it was," Mr. Gagnon says. Last year Kollsman had $43 million of sales with 1,000 employes, compared with $35 million of sales with 1,500 employes during the last year on Long Island. Most important, Kollsman is today turning a healthy profit, he says.

Similarly, when Mass Machine & Stamping Co., a $4-million-a-year maker of flat washers, wanted to move to larger quarters from its Boston headquarters 2½ years ago, it discovered that "we just couldn't afford real estate in the Boston area," says Richard Theurer, executive vice president. The firm's officers looked in Nashua, N.H., met with Gov. Thomson and found Mr. Tamposi, the developer, who "had a building up here that fit us perfectly" at "substantially" less than anything in Boston, he says. Mr. Theurer says his firm couldn't be happier. His only fear is that so many others will see how attractive New Hampshire is that the state will be "ruined."●

NEW YORK'S JUNE SHOWDOWN

HON. JOHN H. ROUSSELOT

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as this body will be taking up the New York City Financial Assistance Act of 1978, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the following editorial, and letter to the editor, by Francis Schanck, which appeared in the May 25 edition of the Wall Street Journal:

NEW YORK'S JUNE SHOWDOWN

The New York City financial crisis is rapidly building toward a last-minute crunch next month, which seems more and more likely to result in one of two outcomes. Either the city will be forced into the courts to formally recognize its bankruptcy. Or the federal government will open the spending floodgates by handing out blank checks to every band of city hall pols in the country.

At the moment the immediate parties are dancing through an Alphonse and Gaston fairyland The municipal unions don't want to settle their wage negotiations until they learn how much money the federal Treasury is willing to throw in the pot, and Secretary Blumenthal won't say how much until there's a labor settlement. The state legislature is toing and froing on further state guarantees for more bond issues by the Municipal Assistance Corporation, while MAC says it can't use existing authority until the matter is settled. Union pension fund trustees hint that they won't make the bond purchases they've already promised if the whole house of cards is going to collapse anyway after current federal loans are repaid June 30. If the federal government is to do anything, new legislation will be necessary, and Sen. Proxmire. who heads the relevant Senate committee, has just postponed scheduled hearings, saying that other parties haven't fulfilled their commitments to get their affairs in order first.

The whole spectacle is based on the heady premise that New York's problem is a financing problem, that the essential task is to arrange the pieces of a complicated financial puzzle into a new infusion of loans. But the loan puzzle would be no problem if there were any real likelihood that the loans will ever be repaid. The doctors are concocting a patent medicine cure for anemia, but the patient has a severed artery. The fuss about financing only serves to obscure reality. New York's problem is a budget problem. The essential task is to stop spending more than it takes in.

This task New York's pols have steadfastly refused to face. The principal budget-cutting tool has been labor force attrition, which succeeded in reducing payroll numbers without reducing payroll costs. A billion dollar infusion of additional federal aid in programs like CETA has served to reduce the budget deficit, but it continues to run about $1 billion a year, not counting $700 million over two years the city has offered in the current labor negotiations.

Even today the city refuses to face up to fundamental decisions about what services it can afford to offer. After three years of "financial emergency" it still operates a municipal broadcasting system. It still operates a huge city hospital system despite a surplus of beds. It hasn't even begun to talk about the long-term blight it visits on itself by the huge middle-class subsidy of rent control.

The virtue of a formal bankruptcy would be to get reality on the table. No doubt it would result in a severe crisis, with work stoppages, horrendous litigation, emergency legislation in Washington and Albany and so on. But the crisis would force some kind of decision on what can and cannot be afforded. The most sophisticated of New York's financial nursemaids have in effect been trying to arrange a bankruptcy by another name, hoping that conditions on federal loans would substitute for a bankruptcy crisis in forcing fundamental decisions. This has not worked; the result has been only to prolong the illusion and no doubt intensify the eventual misery.

This time the city may very well stumble into bankruptcy from the sheer complexity of the rescue effort, for the complexity diffuses away from any one or few individuals the political responsibility for a bankruptcy decision. On the other hand, the administration seems increasingly intent on redeeming the President's campaign promise to bail out the city no matter what. The crunch of next month's crisis will no doubt bring forth hasty and gimmicky legislative proposals, with "guarantees" and "loans" to hide a de facto federal subsidy for the city's feckless ways.

What Congress will have to remember is not complex, but simple: New York is returning to the trough a second time, that if it is fed again it will be back a third time and a fourth. And that as city halls everywhere see the lesson, New York will only be the head of the line.

DO NOT BAIL OUT THE BIG APPLE

If W. Bernard Richland had done some research into the history of municipal defaults in this century I doubt if he would have written "Why Bankruptcy Won't Cure the Big Apple" (May 4). Even a cursory review of what actually happened in the Thirties to the city of Detroit, the state of Arkansas and other political entities that defaulted in the Depression would not support his suicide scenario.

My relatively unheard voice was one of those other than The Wall Street Journal raised in 1975 recommending no federal rescue for New York City. As one who also was active in municipal finance during the Thirties, I read with considerable dismay the newest repetition of the Felix Rohatyn "call out the troops" theme. There is no evidence to support the assumption that basic governmental services stop when cities default. The seemingly general acceptance of this concept expressed by Mr. Richland as "no food, no coal, no oil, no gasoline for police cars, fire engines . . . no nothing" has been a principal contributing cause to the disastrous developments of the past three years.

In the Thirties when cities could not pay the interest or principal on their bonds, in most cases, bondholders' protective committees were formed. Representatives of the bondholders met with city officials and worked out a practical program based on the realities. Obviously it is to the bondholders' long term interests to have the city become again a healthy community as rapidly as possible. This means that cash must be found to maintain essential services and, as far as I know, no bondholders' committees ever held otherwise. Bondholders usually were willing, for an agreed upon period, to either eliminate or accept reduced interest payments on their bonds and extend maturities.

What happened in New York City's 1975 moratorium—another name for default—was just the opposite. Through the creation of the Municipal Assistance Corporation, some $5 billion of New York City's maturing debt has been refunded at substantially increased interest rates.

It seems to me by far the greatest cost is, at best, a paralyzing and, at worst, a lethal blow to state sovereignty and local autonomy. The example for other states and municipalities, if New York is rescued by the federal government, to go thou and do likewise is inescapable. Why risk voter displeasure by balancing budgets or prudently managing community affairs when profligacy pays so well?

All defaults are sad. When any individual or group of individuals is unable to meet its commitments someone gets hurt. Usually, and New York is certainly not an exception, efforts to prevent or to postpone the inevitable add to the total anguish. The brains which have been combining to avoid bankruptcy should be employed in using this powerful, if unpopular corrective device. Investors, over recent years, who bought New York and Big Mac bonds received yields well in excess of other, good quality, tax exempts. By reaching for those yields investors accepted the risks inherent in those bonds. How can investors be persuaded to buy top quality bonds at AAA yields if high risk bonds are to be rescued by the federal government?

REPORT ON CHINA BY CONGRESSMAN WILLIAM LEHMAN

HON. JOHN BRADEMAS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, one of the ablest and most respected Members of the House of Representatives is our distinguished colleague, the Honorable WILLIAM LEHMAN of Florida.

Congressman LEHMAN returned recently from a trip that he and several other Members of the House and Senate made to the People's Republic of China.

Mr. LEHMAN wrote an excellent report on his visit to that country and I believe that other Members will read with interest his observations and I insert Mr. LEHMAN's report at this point in the RECORD:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
May 2, 1978.

DEAR FRIENDS: One morning in mid-March, our Congressional Office received a call from the White House asking me to accompany a mission to Mainland China.

The relationship between the United States, the world's most productive nation, and China, the world's most populous nation, will be important in determining the future peace and well-being of the world. I was pleased to have this rare opportunity to learn first-hand about China, where a new leadership came to power in 1976 after the death of Chairman Mao Tse-tung, and to be able to share my observations and impressions of China with the people of the 13th Congressional District.

Later that day at the White House, I met with the other members of our delegation (three other House members and two Senators, including Florida Senator Lawton Chiles), for the first briefing session of what became an intensive course in the politics, society and economy of Mainland China.

On March 22, the evening before departure, we experienced our first combination of communism and cuisine at the Peoples Republic of China (PRC) Liaison Office in Washington. We were served delicious food in a room decorated with wall murals of poems written in Chinese calligraphy in Chairman Mao's own hand.

After a twenty-hour flight, we disembarked at Shanghai International Airport. Our group was cordially welcomed to China with the customary tea reception by the Deputy Director of the Foreign Affairs Bureau of the Shanghai Revolutionary Committee, Li Chuwen, and other PRC officials.

"It is fitting," our host remarked, "that your journey begins in the very city where President Nixon and Premier Chou En-lai issued the Shanghai Communique in 1972" which restored ties between the U.S. and Mainland China.

Two hours later, it was "wheels up" again on a Civil Aviation Administration of China (CAAC) plane to Peking. During the following twelve days, we visited many different cities, towns and villages as we logged over 30 hours of train travel and covered more than 500 kilometers by car and bus.

We drank tea with high government officials in the magnificent Great Hall of the People and with poor peasants in their dirt-floor huts. We toured factories that make diesel engines and those that produce porcelain. We saw huge oil refineries in operation and under construction. We visited classrooms for village children and day care centres in industrial areas. A ballet school performed for us and a medical school showed us the teaching of both traditional Chinese and modern Western medicine. We talked with farm laborers and farm commune brigade leaders, with factory workers and factory managers, with teachers and professors, and with city officials and civil servants.

DIPLOMACY AND POLITICS

The number one issue, we were constantly reminded, was normalization of relations between the U.S. and Mainland China. To the Chinese this means U.S. recognition of "one China", requiring the severing of diplomatic ties with Taiwan as a condition for establishing full diplomatic relations with Peking. We were often told that Taiwan is as much a part of China as Long Island is a part of the U.S.

The Chinese view Russia as their major external threat and always refer to their northern neighbor as "the Polar Bear." We were repeatedly warned that the U.S. must contain Soviet expansionism. A high Chinese official told us that the 30-year Chinese-Soviet mutual assistance treaty is a meaningless piece of paper that will not be renewed when it expires in 1980.

We acquired most of our political impressions in Peking, but found the people outside the capital more concerned with the problems of daily life than with politics and diplomacy. I find similar differences when I leave Washington to return home to South Florida.

INDUSTRY

Industry in China ranges from medieval to modern. There are huge factories, and also men still serving as beasts of burden, pulling heavy carts loaded with steel, wood and other materials through the city streets.

Inside the factories, we were surprised to see men and women working on heavy equipment and machinery without hard hats, safety shoes, goggles or even adequate lighting, the basic safety requirements now mandatory in the U.S.

Under its new leadership, Chinese industry has begun to adopt such capitalistic customs as incentive pay and piece-work wages. Foreign trade is also being expanded. Surprisingly, however, the Chinese communists are very financially conservative and refuse to use the foreign bank credits which they have been offered. They believe in a pay-as-you-go economy.

The top salary for an industrial worker is about $60 a month, and women workers receive equal pay with men. One urban industrial family we met paid only $3 a month for rent, which is subsidized, $4 to $5 a month for electricity and cooking gas, which are not subsidized, and $10 for a month's supply of rice, which has not increased in price in 20 years.

All the people with whom we spoke work six days a week, but members of the same family may not have the same day off, as factories operate every day with two or three shifts per day. Women workers receive 56 days of maternity leave with full pay, and child care is available at the factory when they return to work.

Workers receive promotions based on productivity, length of service, and, most important of all, political attitudes. Factory workers may retire at 50 and office workers at 55 with 70 percent of their previous salaries.

AGRICULTURE

Fifty kilometers from Tsupo, in Shantung Province, we visited a huge agricultural commune of 30,000 people, divided into work brigades. The commune is self-sufficient and the people seemed adequately fed. Individuals are able to grow their own gardens and to raise fowl, pigs and rabbits.

Since the communists came to power in 1949, the land has been leveled, improved, irrigated and drained. Crops are rotated scientifically. As far as we could see, mechanization on this and other farm communes is limited to drainage and irrigation pumps.

The sight of hundreds and hundreds of blue-clad people working the land by hand without a single machine leaves me with a lasting impression of the current state of Chinese agriculture. Farm machinery is slowly being introduced, however, and the future of farm laborers displaced by these machines may become a problem. China's officials will probably not permit farm mechanization to proceed more rapidly than their ability to absorb displaced farm workers.

TRANSPORTATION

In the major cities, the factories are located within self-contained communities so that people do not have to commute long distances to work. Homes, schools, stores, hospitals and theaters are all built together with the factories. Therefore, in metropolitan areas, bicycles and a few buses serve as the principal means of transportation.

Between cities, nearly everyone travels by train. When our group first arrived at Shanghai airport, we were the only passengers in the terminal. At the end of our journey, when we returned to Shanghai by train, we arrived at midnight and the railroad station was jammed with thousands of people. When our group did travel by plane, the aircraft ranged from modern Russian-made jets to ancient propeller planes of doubtful origin.

The trains are good and run on time. When we had compartments on our trains, they equalled any accommodations I have experienced in the U.S. or Europe. The train meals were of good restaurant quality, but the dining cars were often without heat, and we had to wear our warmest clothing as we ate.

Even the better hotels are not up to Western standards. The rooms are not too clean and toilet facilities are often primitive. With few exceptions, hotels are unheated, leading Rep. Gillis Long (D-La.) to name our hotel in Chi-nan "The Ice Palace." The huge block walls of the Russian-designed "guest house" seemed to retain all the cold of the past winter. Whenever the sun came out in Chi-nan, we ran outside to get warm.

SOCIETY—CULTURE

Because crime is so rare, China is the only country in the world that I have visited where you do not have to lock or even close your hotel room door. In one case, a shop clerk who had accidently overcharged me the equivalent of about 50¢ tracked me down with great difficulty to make a refund.

There is no tipping in China, and people refuse even token gifts or souvenirs of any monetary value. The only things they would accept were polaroid photos I took of them.

All adults in China dress in two-piece Mao suits of either blue, green or grey. The women wear their hair either short or braided and the men's hair is closely-cropped. The only difference between the dress of soldiers and civilians is metal rather than plastic buttons. Officers are distinguished by four shirt pockets instead of two and by collars with red tabs.

Although adults dress alike, the children are dressed in a variety of bright-colored costumes. The children seem to be happy. We saw hundreds of children during our visit and never once did we hear a child cry.

Public displays of affection are not acceptable. In the whole of China, I saw only one young couple holding hands. As a method of holding down the birth rate, men and women are discouraged from marrying before their late 20's.

The Chinese retain their traditional concern and respect for older people. We saw the elderly automatically allowed to go to the front of the line when people queue up to get on the train.

The Chinese officials showed us the greatest hospitality and served plentiful quantities of delicious food. We even began to get used to the jellyfish, 100-year-old duck eggs, and camel hoof soup, all considered great delicacies. The yogurt was the best I have ever eaten and I found everything delightful except the sea slugs, which the Chinese value for their high protein content.

In the cities and towns, the buildings are a dull grey-brown. There are no birds or grass. In contrast, we saw the exquisite beauty of old China in museums, antique shops and ancient palaces. In Chi-nan, we saw old Buddhist temples and religious caves which had been dug 2,000 years ago. In Peking, we inspected China's modern annual arts and crafts exhibition.

We were apparently the first Americans to visit certain parts of Shantung Province, southeast of Peking. We were so unusual that even in the city of Chi-nan, which has over a million people, we found hundreds waiting when we came out of factories or shops. They were curious to see us and they waved and smiled.

EDUCATION, MEDICINE, AND LAW

Literacy in China is now almost universal. We often saw hundreds of people lined up three and four deep reading the newspapers which are publicly displayed on the sides of buildings. Just think of the future impact a homogeneous society of 900 million people who can read and write would have on the world.

In the public schools, we found joy and high spirits. The textbooks are thin and worn, but the teachers are gifted and dedicated, and the children seemed friendly and outgoing. However, their communist indoctrination begins in nursery school.

Medical care in China is free. Among its unique features are the "barefoot doctors" who take care of 90 percent of people's ailments after only one year of medical training.

High school students who wish to become physicians must first pass a rigorous entrance exam and are then admitted to a five-year medical school. The medical school we visited was not well-equipped by Western standards, but the artificial larynx (voice box) we were shown proved their ability to do very advanced research.

There are no lawyers in China, and there is no formal legal training. The judicial system works through non-adversary proceedings, and the rulings of those who administer justice in China are not subject to independent interpretation.

PROPAGANDA

Constant 1984-style propaganda is part of daily life in Mainland China, and it was very difficult for us to understand its intensity.

To those now in authority, all current economic, moral and political problems are the result of the Gang of Four, the internal enemy of the people who, we were told, tried to destroy the spirit, the will and the future progress of the country. The Gang of Four was the losing side in the power struggle which broke out after the death of Chairman Mao and Premier Chou En-lai. It included Mao's widow and nephew, who were more radical and anti-intellectual than the present leadership.

We were often given examples of the Gang's effect. The ballet school had no spirit until they "smashed the Gang of Four." Then they had enough spirit to send a group on tour to Canada. The medical school had not been able to progress until, "overcoming their spiritual shackles, they learned well the teachings of Chairman Mao, and smashed the Gang of Four." Even the first words a patient spoke with his new artificial larynx were to praise Chairman Mao, thank Premier Hua, and denounce the Gang of Four. Our group concluded that the members of the Gang of Four were the busiest four people who ever existed.

FUTURE UNITED STATES–CHINA RELATIONS

Both America and China would benefit from increased mutual cooperation. The British, Canadians, and Australians already have newsmen in China, and we saw many Japanese businessmen. We should be expanding our exchanges of students, businessmen, reporters and other interested individuals.

The U.S cannot remain the only major power in the world which does not have full diplomatic relations with Mainland China, but we need not move too fast. China does not produce much that we really need right now. Our present annual trade with China is only about the same as that with Guatemala, but the potential in the future could be very great.

At present, the U.S. Liaison Office in Peking is treated as well, if not better, than the missions of many other countries with full embassies in China. In the absence of formal diplomatic relations, however, we are unable to conclude trade, airline, shipping, consular and other types of intergovernmental agreements which would enable U.S.-China relations to develop beneficially.

Although I support the eventual establishment of formal U.S. diplomatic relations with Mainland China, we must also guarantee that there be no forceable military takeover by China of the people of Taiwan. Taiwan, a nation with strong economic and political ties to the U.S., is presently capable of defending itself against any conventional military threat from China, and Peking is unlikely to use its nuclear weapons against the island.

One could spend a lifetime in China and never know anything about the country. In the intensive program arranged for our group, we were able to absorb a great deal about this vast and puzzling land. From our visit, we learned how much progress China has made in the last thirty years. During the lifetimes of our children and grandchildren, it will join the ranks of the superpowers. We must, therefore, find some way to increase the future understanding and friendship between our two nations.

While we saw many beautiful sights in China, I am sure the most satisfying was at the end of our journey at Shanghai airport. An American air force plane was waiting there with a big red, white and blue flag on its tail. To us it meant "home again to the land of the free."

With every good wish, I am,

Sincerely,

WILLIAM LEHMAN,
Member of Congress.●

INTERDEPENDENCE AND TIMELY COMPONENT COORDINATION

HON. BOB WILSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. BOB WILSON. Mr. Speaker, from time to time over the past three decades, the House of Representatives unofficial Philosopher in Residence has produced "mini-essays" which contain great quantities of common sense.

Joe, who has probably known more House Members on a first name basis than any man in history has just produced another fine essay—this one entitled "Interdependence and Timely Component Coordination."

I ask unanimous consent to include his essay as a part of my remarks:

INTERDEPENDENCE AND TIMELY COMPONENT-CO-ORDINATION

Occasionally term selected for director of wide-range task is co-ordinator. Term breathes with potential for progress toward predetermined goals. It is harmonious adjustment of components involved in complex matters, few existing in isolation and composed of separate and related elements. It may be wise to deal with such factors one by one. Human minds grasp most readily single, uncluttered concepts. Still those facets are parts of the whole picture. In a specialized era, all facets have advocates who stress their aims. Competition among them can preclude evaluation of the situation. Then expert co-ordinator with new face and fresh approach may achieve impartial objectivity, difficult to attain by avid contenders.

Two thoughts come to mind. Professional golfers illustrate co-ordination process. When driving ball from first tee, they must coordinate every body-component. If any deviate at all, the drive is not good. Or, consider Law School Course. New students often are confused by variety of subjects: evidence, real property, sales and wills. Only in final year do they fall into perspective.

An astute teacher said that big problems merely are a collection of small ones. Solution lies in breaking the giant into its components. That counsel has pertinence now at every stage of human activity—from provincial tasks to international affairs. Certainly it applies to American domestic problems. We live in a world—figuratively and steadily shrinking in size with unlocking of each new secret of nature. Lightning-like rapidity of communication, moreover has produced a constantly-widening awareness of this progress—everywhere.

Just as ideas don't exist in isolation neither do people nor nations. Fortress America is an illusion. We cannot withdraw inside our borders to concentrate on what mistakenly may be considered our own, best interests. With infinite wisdom the Creator scattered material resources—far and wide. There are no natural monopolies, only those made by mankind. Self-sufficiency, too, is illusive. We all need each other for they have something we want. In the common interest of humanity—eventually we must learn to trust others.

Such emphasis-shift from selfishness to altruism—almost challenges human nature itself. Like all changes of magnitude, it will not arrive suddenly. Centuries of deep-rooted jealousy present formidable obstacle to that achievement. It will come gradually. For gradualness—anathema to some people—is a law of nature! Have any of us ever seen growth of grass, beards or fingernails? Yet they go on all the time. Furthermore, in the Grand Design, diffusing material resources is— a parallel: skills, talents and ability of human individuals. With them we must also strive to cooperate.

Irrespective of title, doesn't every, able executive co-ordinate when reconciling conflicting views? Consultation on all schools of related thought is imperative; and it must be timely i.e., before decision-making. Otherwise, adversaries needlessly may be created! On signing Declaration of Independence, Ben Franklin said: "We must all hang together or assuredly we shall all hang separately." Why not Declarations of Interdependence—with constant implementation thereof? For, Interdependence and Timely Component Co-Ordination—ultimately may contribute substantially to survival of the human species!●

THE FIGHT TO IMMUNIZE CHILDREN

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, Christoper Cohen, one of our distinguished public officials, was alderman of Chicago's 46th ward and is now director of HEW's region V. Mr. Cohen is respected for his special interest in and knowledge of Government programs in our urban areas.

Director Cohen recently contributed an article discussing the importance of childhood immunization programs and the efforts made by the Government to contain the risk level of dangerous diseases across the country. The article appeared in the May 29 Perspective section of the Chicago Tribune; and I believe that it deserves the attention of the Members:

[From the Chicago Tribune, May 29, 1978]

THE FIGHT TO IMMUNIZE CHILDREN

(By Christoper B. Cohen)

Significant progress is beginning to show up in the national campaign to protect the 20 million American children most vulnerable to seven dangerous diseases.

Joseph A. Califano, secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare [HEW] took action a year ago to bring down high levels of risk. At the start, 40 percent of children under 15 were unprotected against the seven diseases—polio, measles, German measles [or rubella], mumps, diphtheria, whooping cough [or pertussis], and tetanus.

The campaign's specific goals are: to raise the immunization level against these diseases to 90 percent [the level needed to ensure against an epidemic]; and to set up a permanent system to provide comprehensive immunization to three million children born each year.

As a recent Tribute editorial pointed out "The vaccination campaign has the moral and financial support of the federal government." But it is truly a national, not just governmental, campaign enlisting the support of all sectors of American society: local, state and federal governments; voluntary organizations; professional health groups; educators; labor and industry. It is being waged with the will of citizens to mobilize against deadly—but defeatable—enemies, more than with Treasury dollars. It requires unprecedented efforts to arouse public concern about this country's intolerably low levels of childhood immunity.

Out of 52 million children under the age of 15 a year ago, more than 19 million were not immunized against the killer polio. And the number of kids unprotected was going up. It was apparent that many young parents had forgotten the iron lungs and crutches associated with the paralyzing effects of polio less than a generation ago and the mental and physical handicaps inflicted on thousands of rubella victims in the 1960s.

In Illinois, more than 50,000 youngsters had little or no protection against polio, according to a state health department survey done a few months ago.

Last year at this time we were most concerned about measles outbreaks. Measles cases increased each year since 1973. Nationwide, nearly 12 million kids were not immunized against measles. In Illinois, 43,000 of the 160,000 pupils entering school for the first time were not protected against measles.

Our progress recently has been good. Measles cases in the last three months of 1977 dropped 65 percent below the same period in 1976. The number of immunizations in publicly funded programs—the only ones for which there are complete figures—increased in 1977 over 1976 for all seven diseases. Consequently, measles, rubella and mumps cases have declined in most states during the first four months of this year over that period last year. The exceptions are Illinois and three other Midwestern states where rubella cases have increased this year.

The thing to remember is that these are not mere statistics, but figures that mean smaller numbers of children getting sick—some of them escaping lifelong handicaps. Few realize that out of every 1,000 measles cases there is one death.

Although this progress is encouraging, we have to work still harder to reach children in low-income areas and preschoolers everywhere. HEW is promoting immunization through its health service professional organizations and other federal departments to improve in these areas. We are making maximum use of all of HEW's programs such as community health centers, day care and Head Start centers, and early screening and treatment programs for poor children.

Many sectors have contributed to our successes so far:

Seventeen states have decided to enforce their school entry immunization laws, to refuse to admit children who don't have the required immunizations. Independent school districts [including Chicago] in many of the other states are doing the same.

Local school and health authorities nationwide are cooperating with each other more than in the past.

Medical organizations are asking physicians and auxiliary groups to review patients' immunization status and to educate parents about the importance of having youngsters immunized; hospitals are giving new mothers information and shot records before they leave.

The AFL–CIO is informing its members about the importance of immunization.

Businesses are helping with promotional activities. In some states, McDonald's has offered a free hamburger, french fries, or other rewards to children who get all their shots. Metropolitan Life Insurance's sales force gives booklets on immunization to parents.

Local chapters of voluntary groups such as Red Cross, nursing leagues, and PTA are helping schools to review records, contacting parents, and conducting publicity.

News media coverage of the problem has been excellent and some TV spots will feature characters from "Star Wars."

But there still are parents who don't understand that the preventable diseases can threaten their children's lives.

Parents should keep and periodically check the vaccination records of each of their children. If you're not sure whether a child has had all the initial and booster shots, call your doctor or health care provider.

If a child is missing one or more shots, and you cannot afford to pay a doctor's fee, take the child to any of 34 public health clinics in Chicago [call 842–7910 for the nearest location] or look in your telephone directory for the city, county, or township health department nearest to you.

[3] Since schools are the principal places both for disease to spread and for opportunities to check immunization records, help your school and local health officials by cooperating when they send you forms asking to report on your children's immunization status.

[4] Get behind and participate in any drives in your neighborhood or school or church organization activities to locate children who are inadequately protected, to persuade their parents to have them immunized, and to spread awareness of the problem in your community.●

ADDRESS OF CONGRESSMAN JOHN BRADEMAS AT OPENING OF EXHIBITION COMMEMORATING BICENTENNIAL OF THE BIRTH OF GENERAL JOSÉ DE SAN MARTÍN

HON. EDWARD R. ROYBAL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, as Chairman of the Hispanic Caucus in the House of Representatives, I was very pleased to note a recent address given by our colleague, the distinguished majority whip of the House of Representatives, the Honorable JOHN BRADEMAS of Indiana, on the occasion of the opening of an exhibit commemorating the bicentennial of the birth of General José de San Martín.

Congressman BRADEMAS, I think it is significant to point out, Mr. Speaker, delivered his address on this occasion in Spanish.

The ceremony at which Mr. BRADEMAS spoke was conducted in the Hispanic Society Room of the Library of Congress on February 24, 1978.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to insert at this point in the RECORD the text of Mr. BRADEMAS' address in English:

REMARKS OF CONGRESSMAN JOHN BRADEMAS

Dr. Boorstin; Ambassador Aja Espil of Argentina; my valued friend, Secretary General of the Organization of American States, Alepandro Orfila; Dr. Kahler, Chief of the Latin American Division; President of the San Martín Society, Dr. Garcia Godoy; Ladies and Gentlemen:

I count it a great honor to have been invited to be with you on this important occasion. You may ask why is it that a Congressman from South Bend, Indiana, should be speaking at the Library of Congress at an event marking the bicentennial of the birth of José de San Martín?

The answer is simple. Although I am a professional politician, I am at heart a frustrated Hispanist.

In the eighth grade I read a book about the Mayas that caused me to choose as the first career to which I aspired, that of archeologist, specializing, despite my Hellenic heritage, in Central America.

Later in school I thought that I wanted to be a businessman active in export-import work in Latin America. In college days, I spent a summer in the mountains of the state of Puebla, Mexico, working with Aztec Indians, helping them build a playground, assisting them in coping with tropical diseases, and teaching them farm skills.

Later, as an undergraduate at Harvard, I wrote an honors thesis on the Sinarquista movement in Mexico.

And later still, as a student at Oxford, I decided, after having read Gerald Brenan's seminal work, The Spanish Labyrinth, to write a doctoral dissertation on the role of the anarcho-syndicalists in Spain during the Twenties and the first years of the Spanish Civil War. My research involved talks with anarchists exiled in Paris and in the South of France and work in libraries in Amsterdam and London as well, of course, as in Spain.

In 1961, during my second term in Congress, I visited Argentina with my Connecticut colleague, Congressman Robert Giaimo, both of us young supporters of President John F. Kennedy and of the Alliance for Progress, to explore ways in which the United States could help colleges and universities in Latin America play a more effective role in the economic development and social growth of the nations of the rest of the hemisphere as well as in strengthening free political institutions there.

During nearly twenty years of service in Congress, I have continued my interest in Latin America and the Hispanic world generally—and as some of you may know, I have been a vigorous champion of Federal support of the arts and the humanities and of libraries, including the Library of Congress.

In this last connection, I feel a special kinship with the Hispanic Division of the Library and appreciation for two valued friends and outstanding members of its staff, Dolores Martín, editor of the Handbook of Latin American Studies, and Georgette Dorn, specialist in Hispanic culture.

I hope, then, that my Hispanic credentials are sufficiently in order to be permitted at least to offer some modest observations on this occasion.

WHO WAS SAN MARTÍN?

Who was José de San Martín?

With Simón Bolivar, San Martín was the most important leader of the independence movement in South America.

San Martín was born in Yapeyú, Argentina. He received first-rate military training in Spain, where he also fought with distinction as an officer in the Spanish army against the forces of Napoleon.

Indeed, it was while San Martín was in a military encampment that news of the insurrection in South America reached him. In his own words, he "realized that the war he was fighting for Spain, he should really be waging against Spain and in favor of his homeland."

San Martín became commander of the revolutionary forces in Buenos Aires where he formed the famed regiment of grenadiers.

On being named Governor of the Province of Cuyo (now Mendoza), in the foothills of the Andes, he initiated untutored revolutionary forces in the art and discipline of fighting well-equipped Spanish armies.

In 1817, in a daring feat, San Martín and his army crossed the Andean Cordillera at the highest peak in the hemisphere. From snowy mountain paths, the revolutionaries fell upon the royalist troops in Chile and, after several major battles, freed the region from Spanish rule.

Although he was invited to accept the governorship of Chile, San Martín refused the honor and instead set out immediately to plan the liberation of Peru. In this effort he had the support, despite internecine struggles, of the government in Buenos Aires.

LIBERTY FROM SPAIN

Leading troops from both Argentina and Chile, San Martín proceeded to Peru. And after battles and intricate negotiations with the Spaniards, Peru was also able to win liberty from the Spanish yoke.

San Martín governed Peru for over a year during which time he carried out far reaching liberal reforms. By 1822 he had reached the zenith of power.

The forces of Bolivar coming from the North and San Martín's approaching from the South met in Peru. San Martín realized that in order to stage a major final drive against the colonial power, one of the two leaders should become supreme commander of the allied forces. Unconvinced of Bolivar's wholehearted cooperation, San Martín resigned as Protector of Peru and handed over his entire army to Bolivar.

San Martín's gesture remains a remarkable example of self-denial and of putting patriotic interest ahead of personal ambition.

In an effort to isolate himself from the incessant infighting among Argentine patriots, San Martín went to Chile. Shortly thereafter, in 1824, he sailed for Europe convinced that his continued presence in Argentina could be perceived as a threat by rising political leaders.

It was toward the end of 1828 that San Martín made a final trip to South America, stopping in Montevideo. The news from across the River Plate was so disheartening that he returned to Europe without setting foot on his native soil. A pilgrimage to call upon San Martín became a must for Argentine and other South American visitors to France, among these, Domingo Faustino Sarmiento, the great Argentine educator, who became an important nation-builder and a leading intellectual of 19th Century Argentina.

COMMITMENT TO DEMOCRACY

It seems to me, as we meet in the year 1978, we should remember above all the great influence which San Martín's deep commitment to freedom from Spain and to the principles of democracy exercised on the early independence movement in Spanish America.

There is no question that his activities hastened the declaration of independence by Argentina. In one letter San Martín wrote:

How much longer will we wait to declare our independence Is it not ridiculous to coin money, hoist the flag, and have cockades and wage war against Spain, from whom one believes we still depend? . . . Men of courage should not fear decisions. If independence is not declared the Congress of Tucumán is a sham.

San Martín rejoiced greatly when on July 9, 1816, the Congress of Tucumán declared independence.

It is, I think, significant that he opposed a military regime for his country, stating that "military might is only capable of getting us out of the swamp."

Yet he made clear that he favored a strong and vigorous government "to avoid the evils that would result from war, disorder, and anarchy."

THE LESSONS OF SAN MARTÍN'S LEGACY

In this day and age when democratic governments seem to be in such difficulty throughout the world, we should remember that San Martín believed firmly in the principle of representative democracy.

In a year when we are debating the signing of the Panama Canal treaties, it is fitting to recall San Martín's deep conviction that each nation should determine its own destiny.

San Martín championed as well a faith in a common American destiny for the people of the hemisphere. He enthusiastically endorsed the tenets of the Monroe Doctrine of preventing European intervention into hemispheric affairs.

He worked tirelessly toward recognition throughout the world of Spanish American independence, and you will recall that in 1822, the independence of Argentina was formally recognized by the United States.

Throughout his long retirement, San Martín was saddened by the continued and bloody struggles for power in many of the South American republics. He repeatedly offered to help in repelling French forces invading from the River Plate region.

He died in exile, in 1850, without seeing the ultimate unification of Argentina a decade later.

What, then, is the lesson of San Martín for our times?

He consistently placed the interests of his country above his own.

He constantly urged the peoples of South America to strive to build free, strong, independent and progressive nations.

Above all, he believed that the destiny of each nation should be shaped by its own people and not by outside forces.

Self-rule, self-government, strong democratic institutions, respect for individual rights—these were the lessons of the great "Liberator" of Argentina.

They are lessons we should do well to heed today.●

REINTRODUCTION OF H.R. 12728, THE SUSAN B. ANTHONY DOLLAR COIN ACT OF 1978

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I have reintroduced H.R. 12728 which now will have 25 sponsors. The following are excerpts from my remarks given at the Subcommittee on Historic Preservation and Coinage:

Mr. Chairman, the administration has proposed that the new coin be issued with a so-called contemporary version of the liberty head design on the obverse side. This was very disappointing to many Americans including the Congresswoman's caucus, who had written to the Secretary of the Treasury, requesting that the Department propose the portrait of Susan B. Anthony. I have for submission into the hearing record a copy of the letter dated March 22, 1978 the caucus wrote to Mr. Blumenthal. We never received a response which I find surprising and alarming.

Senator PROXMIRE, chairman of the Senate Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs Committee has also introduced a similar bill in the Senate, and has reiterated his support for the portrait of Ms. Anthony. I am also aware that you Mr. Chairman are open minded as to whose portrait is placed on the dollar coin.

I wish to emphasize that this bill has the full support of a wide spectrum of womens' organizations including the League of Women Voters, the National Organization of Women, the National Women's Political Caucus, and the Daughters of the American Revolution.

That is why my colleague PAT SCHROEDER and myself are here today, to request that the subcommittee consider our bill to place Ms. Anthony's portrait on the obverse side of this new dollar coin.

Having an actual woman portrayed on a coin is not a unique concept. As early as 1837, a woman appeared on the circulating coinage in Great Britain, and as early as 1835, Spain circulated coinage with the profile of Isabel. In 1892 the Netherlands circulated coins with the portrait of Wilhelmina. Thus, I would suggest that the concept of a portrait of a woman on circulating coinage in the Western world is not new. In fact we are one of the very few countries which has never had a woman portrayed on a circulating coin.

Why Susan B. Anthony? Today we have the unique opportunity to recognize and honor all women of our great country by placing the portrait of a woman on this coin, whose illustrious career spanned the 19th century, and who, perhaps more than any other woman, changed our lives through her single minded devotion to the principle that all Americans must participate in a democracy. She realized more completely than anyone else that in order for the women of America to truly participate as American citizens, they had to be given the right to vote. In 1848, she laid the groundwork for the passage of the 19th amendment.

Susan B. Anthony retained her leadership of the Women's Suffrage Movement until her death in 1906 at the age of 86. Unfortunately she never lived to see the fruition of her valiant efforts. Ratification, giving women the right to vote, did not occur until 1920, some 15 years later. Her motto "failure is impossible" is as applicable today to those of us who believe in human rights throughout the world. All Americans and in particular women, owe her a tremendous debt of gratitude for her undaunting courage in her single minded crusade to attain this precious democratic right-to-vote.

The portrayal of "Miss Liberty" has been found on American coins from the 18th century to the 1960's. Currently, we have established a tradition in the 20th century in this country of honoring outstanding American men by placing their portraits on our circulating coinage, beginning with Abraham Lincoln on the copper penny in 1909. Since then, our circulating coinage shows Thomas Jefferson on the nickel, George Washington on the 25-cent piece, Franklin Roosevelt on the dime, and Benjamin Franklin and John F. Kennedy on the 50-cent piece.

Without exception all of our circulating coins now honor Americans—not abstractions—individual men who have earned their place in our Nation's history. Is there any reason why we cannot honor a woman who actually lived? Must we retain a mythological figure? It has been said that all women can identify with the mythological portrayal of Miss Liberty, but I would like to respond by saying that there is one issue with which I am sure that the rainbow of American women in our country of every race, creed, and philosophy can mutually identify—it is the right to express ourselves at the ballot box—the democratic right to vote. Truly Susan B. Anthony who is principally responsible for enabling women to exercise this democratic right represents American women far better than the ill-conceived contemporary design offered to us by the U.S. Treasury. Susan B. Anthony is Miss Liberty and once more she is an American who helped Americans achieve the liberty and freedom we now enjoy.

The proposal to place Susan B. Anthony on the new dollar coin has generated some controversy and opposition from our own Treasury Department. That is not surprising. Susan Anthony generated controversy and faced opposition all her life. This fact did not deter her from her noble cause. We welcome the opportunity now to speak up for her. It would be a very special honor to have this woman's portrait placed on the new dollar coin. By doing so we honor all Americans who cherish their democracy, and their liberty, which has as its fundamental concept the right to vote.

THE ECONOMIC RECOVERY ACT OF 1978

HON. RICHARD NOLAN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, on May 11, 1978, I reintroduced the Economic Recovery Act of 1978, incorporating several new provisions which differ from the original bill. A summary of the new bill follows:

THE ECONOMIC RECOVERY ACT OF 1978

The Economic Recovery Act implements the economic goals mandated by the Full Employment and Balanced Growth Act of 1978 (the Humphrey-Hawkins Bill), which passed the House of Representatives on March 20, 1978. The Humphrey-Hawkins Bill includes a provision mandating economic goals and policies designed to obtain farm income at 100% of parity at the marketplace during the next five years. The Economic Recovery Act, in accordance with the provisions of the Humphrey-Hawkins Bill, gradually improves farm income during the next five years, reaching 100% of parity by 1982.

FARM COMMODITY PRICES

Agricultural commodities may not be bought, sold or traded for less than their established prices, nor for more than 110% of the established prices. The established price for each agricultural commodity (determined by the National Board of Agricultural Governors) is based on the parity price or the comprehensive cost of production price for each such commodity, whichever is greater.

The established price will not reach 100% of parity until 1982. The governing price level will be 85% of the established price in 1979, 90% of the established price in 1980, and 95% of the established price in 1981. Civil penalties are imposed for anyone who buys, sells or trades agricultural commodities at prices less than the above stipulated price levels or in excess of 110% of the established price.

NATIONAL BOARD OF AGRICULTURAL GOVERNORS

The Economic Recovery Act establishes a National Board of Agricultural Governors. The Board shall establish and administer all agricultural production and marketing programs in the United States.

The Board is composed of 50 farmers, 2 consumer representatives, 2 labor representatives, 2 business representatives (all appointed by the President) and the Secretary of Agriculture. Of the 50 farmer members of the Board, the President shall select one from among the 3 members of each state ASCS committee, which shall be elected by the producers of each state. The farmer members of the Board must be actively engaged in agricultural production as their primary source of income. Each Board member shall serve for a term of 3 years.

The Board's functions include establishing the following: parity prices and comprehensive cost of production prices, established prices, national production goals, acreage allotments and marketing quotas, a reserve program and import quotas.

NATIONAL PRODUCTION GOALS

The Board shall establish annual national production goals for each agricultural commodity. The production goals shall be based upon: (1) estimated domestic requirements, including reserves, and (2) estimated export requirements, and (3) levels of production consistent with U.S. agricultural conservation programs.

ACREAGE ALLOTMENTS AND MARKETING QUOTAS

The Board shall establish acreage allotments and marketing quotas for each agricultural commodity in an amount equal to the production goals established for such commodity. The acreage allotments and marketing quotas shall be based on the production history for each farm, taking the highest production during three of the five previous years. When appropriate commodity groups may elect, by producer referendum, to participate in either the acreage allotment or marketing quota program.

Each producer's production history shall be retained with the land for which such production history is established. Marketing quotas may be negotiable only between bonafide farmers within states and on an annual basis. Producers may not exceed their normal crop acreage unless specifically authorized by the Board.

The Board shall establish rules and procedures to adjust the allocation of acreage allotments and marketing quotas to assure fair and equitable allocation thereof. The Board must allocate marketing quotas in a manner that will not adversely affect the economy of any county or local community.

The Board shall decrease or increase the allocation of acreage allotments or marketing quotas for each commodity to reflect decreases or increased in the production goals for each such commodity. Such adjustments in acreage allotments or marketing quotas shall be applied uniformly to all producers of each commodity.

Producers may grow, raise or produce any amount of agricultural commodities on their individual normal crop acreage, but no agricultural commodities shall be sold or traded in excess of their acreage allotment or marketing quota. All agricultural production which exceeds the respective acreage allotment or marketing quota, and which is storable, shall be sealed by the Board and stored at the producer's expense as a producer-owned reserve which shall be administered under terms established by the Board.

NON-FARM CORPORATIONS

No acreage allotments or marketing quotas shall be allocated under this Act to non-farm corporations if a majority interest in any such corporation is held by those not engaged in farming operations. The Board may, at its discretion, delay implementation of this provision from two to five years.

Farmer-owned cooperatives, family farm corporations and charitable organizations are exempt from this provision.

RESERVE PROGRAM

With the consent of Congress, the Board may establish a reserve program which will be flexible enough to acquire stocks of commodities produced in compliance with acreage allotments and marketing quotas but which, because of unforeseen changes in supply and demand, the market cannot absorb. In order to acquire stocks, the Board shall issue marketing quotas for the purchase of commodities produced in excess of domestic and export requirements. All stocks on hand at the time this Act becomes law will be eligible for purchase by the Board as part of the reserve stocks.

Reserve stocks may be stored by producers at commercial storage rates or under such other terms and conditions as the Board considers necessary.

Reserve stocks shall be released only for use in domestic food and fiber emergencies or disaster situations, as determined by the President, and for humanitarian food or fiber relief needs in the event of emergencies in other countries. Reserve stocks of each agricultural commodity may be sold in quantities equal to the difference between actual production and the national production goals for each commodity. If more than a minimal amount of any commodity is required to meet production shortfalls, the additional reserve stocks will be purchased from available producer-owned supplies.

IMPORT-EXPORT POLICY

The Board shall limit the volume of competitive agricultural imports to the amount necessary to fulfill national consumption needs when the U.S. experiences a shortfall in production.

All imported agricultural commodities shall be priced at a minimum of 110 percent of the established price, or 10 percent over the current market price, whichever is greater. The tariff revenues obtained from the importation of agricultural commodities shall be placed in a special credit account for the exporting nations to purchase U.S. products. The special credit account shall be established and administered by the Board.

No agricultural commodities shall be exported at less than 100 percent of the established price, except for those commodities exported under food assistance programs.

Federal inspection regulations covering agricultural commodities produced in the United States shall also be applied to imported agricultural commodities as a condition for entry into the United States or its possessions.

PRODUCER REFERENDUMS

The Board's recommendations regarding acreage allotments and marketing quotas shall be subject to producer referendums. If 15 percent of the producers who have a production history affected by the Board's recommendation petition the Board for a referendum, the Board shall, not later than one month after validating the petition, conduct a referendum, by secret ballot, of such producers. If the Board determines that more than a majority of the producers voting in the referendum oppose the proposed recommendation, it shall be withdrawn.

In any event any commodity group wishes to be excluded from the provisions of this Act, such producers may use the referendum procedure so that all of the producers in the commodity group will be able to vote on the question.

CONSUMER INFORMATION

Retail food stores shall be required to post information providing a comparison between average cost to consumers for food products and the average farm value of the same product in order to clearly establish the amount which farmers receive for their share of the food product. This information shall be displayed prominently in retail food stores.●

THE NEED FOR THE HUMANE APPROACH OF HOSPICE CARE

HON. DOUGLAS WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, in the May 30, 1978, issue of the Washington Post, Mr. Nicholas von Hoffman comments on the health care his mother received during her terminal illness. I encourage all Members to read his account for it illustrates the need for the humane approach of hospice care for the terminally ill.

THE STRUGGLE TO DIE IN PEACE

(By Nicholas von Hoffman)

"I understand," the doctor told me. "I have an 86-year-old mother who hates doctors. It's quite embarrassing."

The doctor was taking over the management of my nearly 80-year-old mother's case of terminal cancer. A kindly man, who understood this was not the time for treatment but for palliation and the patient's comfort, he was a godsend to a woman who had long since elected to do without the services of orthodox medicine.

What Mother had been encountering were high-tech physicians who couldn't accept someone who had decided not to leave the world via the Hubert Humphrey route. Ten or 12 years ago when she first became aware of having the disease, Mother had decided she would not permit surgery, radiation or chemotherapy, and she has stuck to the decision ever since.

It was up to the rest of us to convince the various kinds of practitioners of medicine that she was of sound mind and mature judgment and her wishes should be observed. That's not so easy with some kinds of doctors. In certain situations it's not the family that pleads for something, anything to be done, but the doctor who pleads with the family to permit it.

A little reading and a little asking around should quickly convince anyone that a patient with advanced cancer may be making a medically sound choice in refusing treatment. Often the odds that the treatment can have even a temporarily palliative effect are long, while the odds that the same treatment will cause awful side effects are relatively short. You won't bet money on a race horse with those chances so why bet the last days of your life?

For some doctors that's hard to live with, so hard their own emotions push them to say wild things in order to be allowed to get at the patient. "You may have heard a lot of romantic things said about a dignified, natural death," said one, "but I'm telling you there's no such thing." Or there was the physician who came into Mother's hospital room to argue her into accepting treatment at 11 o'clock at night. When the patient, paralyzed in her bed, said she was tired and wanted to sleep, the doctor responded, "You know sleep is sometimes a form of escape."

Some weeks ago, Mother decided she would prefer to pop off, as she often refers to her death, via a pill. Four or five times she's brought up the subject of suicide by pill, but in our culture children usually can't bring themselves to give their parents the means to do that.

You have to get your pill for yourself, when you're still healthy. Only rarely will a loved one have the moral self-confidence, the ethical certainty to help you.

Maybe none of us would contemplate taking our own lives if there were institutions for dying. My mother has loved the hospital, but the hospital couldn't keep her. In her advanced state of illness—she is so feeble she can't turn over on her side without assistance—a hospital with a high standard of nursing care can make her reasonably comfortable.

But hospitals aren't places designed to make dying people comfortable. They are treatment institutions. Moreover, under pressure from every side to cut costs, hospitals feel a special obligation to toss out Medicare patients like my mother who will not take any medicine. "Will you let me stay if I take an aspirin," asked Mother, her sharp tongue undiminished by age and illness. Actually, if the family can afford $250 plus a day, the guest may continue to abide on the premises.

For patients like Mother, the solution may be the hospice, a new kind of institution expressly designed for the dying. These are low-tech places where the physician and spiritual comfort of the patient comes first. Whether we can find enough of the right kind of people to work in hospices is problematic. So many of us have been trained to believe the only people worthwhile are those who can perform the miracles of science; we accord little prestige to those who work the less brassy miracles of comfort, compassion and the charity that surpasses understanding.

"I feel like a ball being bounced from one place to another," Mother said of the vicissitudes of finding a peaceful and moderately comfortable Medicare-approved place to die. She is a woman who has composed her soul, she has made her peace with all of us who love her and is leaving us with her blessing, but meekness and forgiveness can be carried too far. "I want you to promise me," she said the other day, "that after I pop off, you'll make sure my body isn't given to medicine."

Mother died on April 28 and it wasn't.●

UNITED STATES-SOVIET RELATIONS NEED REEVALUATION

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, deep and justifiable concern is being registered by the administration and Congress over renewed campaigns by the Soviet Union to expand their influence in the Third World and strengthen their positions in Eastern Europe.

As we grope for the reasons for this new Kremlin aggressiveness we see that their actions are based in part as a reaction to years of appeasement policies by the United States. Whether they be cloaked under terms such as détente, they translate into an inadequate U.S. response to the Soviet Union.

Where are we today? Let us start with Africa. The Soviet Union has embarked upon a concerted, conscientious, and consuming campaign to expand their influence over the continent of Africa. They are doing it themselves with commitment of funds and arms. They have the help of their ally, Cuba, which has tripled its number of troops in Africa from 15,000 in 1977 to more than 42,000 at present. The problem in Zaire occupied center stage with respect to Africa. In Zaire, Communist-backed rebels operating from bases in Marxist Angola launched a surprise attack against the southern province of Shaba on May 11. These insurgents armed with Soviet-made weapons and trained by Cubans made their second effort in 14 months to bring down the prowestern government of President Mobuto Sese-Seko.

World tension mounted as troops from other nations, primarily France, went in to rescue some 2,500 foreigners including 14 Americans, caught in the midst of the turmoil. U.S.-based paratroopers were alerted to take part in a rescue mission but they were not used. The Zaire strife did have its casualties. At least 40 foreigners were killed and there were reports of widespread torture of hundreds of others.

Zaire is by no means the only nation where the Soviet-Cuban alliance is working. Cuban troops are stationed in the following 11 nations of Africa: Algeria, Angola, Benin, Congo, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Libya, Mozambique, and Sierra Leone. In addition, according to U.S. News & World Report, the Cubans and Russians were involved in five of eight so-called bush wars ongoing in Rhodesia, Namibia, Angola, Eritrea, and Ethiopia. The following chart prepared by the U.S. News & World Report discusses the true extent to which Russians have moved in Africa since the onset of détente.

WHERE RUSSIANS HAVE MOVED IN DURING DÉTENTE

Richard M. Nixon's May, 1972, talks with Soviet leaders in Moscow set the stage for détente—a policy aimed at avoiding military conflict between the superpowers. Americans thought détente also meant neither nation would try to take advantage of the other in troubled parts of the world.

What the record shows:

1972. Soviets sent 55 million dollars in arms to Africa, 970 million to the Mideast. Egypt was the major recipient until the Soviet military mission was ousted in July.

1973. Arms worth 2.655 billion dollars were consigned by Russia to the Mideast to replace Arab losses in the 1973 war with Israel. Syria received much of this aid. Arms to African nations were valued at 75 million.

1974. U.S.S.R. arms shipments to Africa went up to 235 million dollars while aid to Mideast nations dropped to 1.785 billion. Contracts were signed for a billion in sales to Libya. Algeria and Somalia also received important shipments.

1975. Africa received 600 million dollars' worth of arms, much of it going to Moscow's new clients in Angola. Soviet shipments to Arab nations fell to 850 million dollars.

1976. Soviet arms shipments to Africa for the first time surpassed those to the Mideast—1.07 billion dollars against 830 million. Also signed: a billion dollar arms agreement with Iraq to include MiG–21s and 23s. Libya received jet fighters and bombers under a deal made in 1974, and fighting in Angola absorbed Soviet warplanes, tanks and guided missiles. Moscow made its first offer of large military credits to Ethiopia.

1977–78. In another startling shift, the Soviets poured an estimated billion dollars' worth of arms into Ethiopia for use against Somalia. The Soviets lost air, naval and missile storage bases in Somalia.

In addition, Moscow since 1972 has paid all expenses of thousands of African and Arab pilots, gunners and technicians that were trained in the Soviet Union.

Mr. Speaker, It represents the practical fallacy of this ill-conceived element of U.S. foreign policy.

The administration has reacted albeit somewhat late to the Soviet-Cuban moves in Africa. Perhaps the strongest attack was made by the President's National Security Adviser Mr. Brzezinski. The President himself has charged Cuba with assisting in the turmoil in Zaire.

Yet, mere strong reactions will not quell this storm. The Soviets see an opportunity for exploitation and are prepared to take full advantage. The United States has ignored Africa for too long, thus permitting the Soviet Union to plant its seeds. The result, the United States is placed in the position of responding to Soviet acts instead of initiating strong relations with the African nations themselves. Yet our failure to adequately respond to Soviet pressures and aggression has permitted it to continue and grow. We must be prepared to meet the Communist challenge in Africa or wherever else it is generated. We must maintain a strong defense and avoid being party to concessionary arms agreements. We must remember that the Soviets are vulnerable. A not yet released NATO study indicates that by the 1980's, the economic deterioration of the Soviet Union will have reached a critical level. The report also indicates that Moscow may be forced to seek economic help from the West. Already the Soviet Union is heavily reliant on U.S. agricultural products. We and our western allies can employ meaningful economic sanctions against the Soviets as a means of halting their advances around the world. We should not be reluctant to impose these sanctions, for it represents a real area of U.S. strength.

Congress as well, must not lose sight of the Soviet challenge. We must not resist those programs in our defense budget which are made to keep us strong. We must not cripple the President's ability to act by questioning the credibility of policy statements. A policy of trust must be established and maintained. It is mutually beneficial.

The Soviet buildup in Eastern Europe occupied much of this week's NATO summit. In a recent interview, Gen. Alexander M. Haig, Jr., Supreme Allied Commander of Europe expressed concern over this buildup and cited the fact that—

> They (Soviets) have overcome a roughly 10 to 1 inferiority in the central strategic balance to the point that today they are at parity or essential equivalence with us.

More specifically in this decade alone, the Kremlin has added some 100,000 troops and an increase of some 40 percent in the numbers of tanks provided to Warsaw Pact nations. Their naval strength has also been beefed up considerably.

The end result is an increasing threat to the NATO nations, a threat which cannot be overlooked or ignored. The response must be a reaffirmation of the basic partnership which exists between the United States and NATO with an adequate commitment by all member nations to guarantee NATO's abilities to counter any Soviet adventures in this region of the world.

The Soviet influence does not end in these areas. Their hands are in virtually all areas of the world. It is more subtle for example in the Middle East. While Egypt renounced its former associations with Moscow, they have not been deterred. They have been conspicuous in their silence with respect to the peace talks and they are working behind the scenes with other Arab States who play a less critical but important role in the future of the Mideast. Here again, the Soviets must be watched.

Finally we must examine Latin America. The Soviet-Cuban influence is more subtle but it does exist. This was a deep concern of mine and a number of my colleagues who oppose the Panama Canal treaties of 1978 which calls for us to turn control of the canal over to Panama in the year 2000. It is a veiled invitation for the Soviet Union to almost move right in and plant a new Communist threat in our backyard.

Of course we cannot overlook the closest of all Communist threats—Cuba a mere 90 miles off the U.S. shores. There was talk early in this administration about working to normalize relations with Cuba. This brought about a groundswell of opposition from many in Congress and a good percentage of the American people. Their recent military aggressiveness has resulted in a complete rethinking of the situation by the administration. If relations are to improve with Cuba it must be on our terms not theirs. Our terms do not include allowing them to engage in adventures in Third World nations.

Another factor to consider is the continued repressive nature of the Soviet Union's policies as they relate to Jews in their own nations and the millions they hold in the captive nations in Eastern Europe. Their failure to respect basic human and civil rights is barbaric and indicative of their continued totalitarian type of rule. The President has made human rights an integral part of our foreign policy. We must bolster this and make it a precondition for any agreements between the United States and the Soviet Union. Foreign policy tends to be more glittery than practical at times. We must yield our hand firmly in our insistence on respect for human rights. Anything less would be hypocrisy. The captive peoples of the world felt betrayed by détente. They must be provided with new hopes.

The Soviet threat is real not imagined. It does not call for hysteria or overreaction. It does not call for renewed military actions by the United States. However, we must keep ourselves strong militarily, and not be overly hasty in progressing on the SALT talks. We cannot give the Soviet Union the impression that they can have their cake and eat it too. We will not settle for agreements limiting arms while they expand their sphere of influence around the world.

No one wants to see a renewal of the cold war. Peace and cooperation with the Soviet Union remains a desirable goal. However, the road has obstacles which must be removed before the journey is completed.●

THE COLORADO PAYS OFF

HON. FRANK E. EVANS

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. EVANS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, during this past year, there have appeared a number of magazine and newspaper articles concerning Federal reclamation policy. The Denver Post article I am placing in the RECORD clearly presents the issues as we are aware of them out West.

Although there is no area of Federal law or policy that cannot stand improvement, I believe much of the recent analysis has been excessively negative and contains a strong no-growth assumption.

The experience of the State of Colorado confirms that intelligent, well planned water development projects are necessary for an area's ability to provide an acceptable standard of living while maintaining environmental quality.

Congress and the Western States have not invested resources in these reclamation projects as some kind of boondoggle or pork barrel. We build these projects, because if we do not save the water that roars through our State for about 60–90 days, there will not be any water for the rest of the year. Consequently, reclamation, water projects, and water programs are absolutely essential and critical to the future of our area.

THE COLORADO PAYS OFF

(By Zeke Scher)

A few blocks off the main street through Montrose, Colo., is an unpretentious group of low-level buildings neatly concealing a gigantic role it plays in the daily life of the Rocky Mountain empire.

The structures house the nerve center of a major federal project that 20 years ago was condemned as a waste of money with no hope of success. A more recent appraisal is savior of much of the arid West—creator of a land of opportunity—as well as a money-maker.

Its name, Colorado River Storage Project, is still clouded by the controversy and confusion that surrounded its birth in 1956. But controversy and confusion have been a hallmark of the Colorado River since 1540 when Spaniards explored upstream from its mouth in the Gulf of California.

Exploration from the upper reaches waited 330 years—until John Wesley Powell's first trip from Green River, Wyo., through the Grand Canyon in 1869. Almost another 100 years passed before the river was harnessed sufficiently to turn "the menace" into a national resource.

Mentioning Montrose in the same sentence with the Colorado River may add to the confusion. The Colorado is no closer than 60 miles from Montrose (at Grand Junction). The river extends 1,360 miles from Rocky Mountain National Park in northern Colorado to Mexico on the Pacific Coast. How does Montrose (pop., 6,496) get in the picture? That is our story.

By the early 1920s it became apparent to booming California, Arizona and Nevada that the natural flow of the Colorado River couldn't be depended upon to supply year-round water demands.

At the same time the slower-developing upstream states—Colorado, Wyoming, Utah and New Mexico—watched with great concern the increased demands on the river by the lower states. The upper states which contained the sources of the river's flow feared permanent loss of the water for development because of first claims on use by the lower states.

In 1922 a U.S. Reclamation Bureau report recommended construction of a huge dam at Boulder Canyon on the lower Colorado, specifying priorities in water use for (1) river regulation and flood control, (2) storage for irrigation and (3) development of power. The upper states objected.

Each group of states wanted their water rights protected, and that is what drew them to Santa Fe, N.M., in November 1922 for a meeting chaired by the U.S. secretary of commerce, Herbert Hoover. The Colorado River Compact resulted. This divided the river into two basins with Lees Ferry, just south of the Utah line in Arizona, as the dividing line.

The compact guaranteed the lower states 7.5 million acre-feet of Colorado River water annually (not less than 75 million acre-feet in any 10-year period).

In 1930 Hoover, then president, signed an appropriation act to start construction of the long-recommended Boulder Dam (completed in 1936 and now named for him). It provided huge storage (31 million acre-feet) and power facilities (1.3 million kilowatts).

Development was non-existent on the river in the vast 113,496 square miles drainage area of the upper basin—one-twelfth of the contiguous United States. Part of the problem was the upper states couldn't even agree among themselves on apportioning the river.

Finally in 1948, avoiding a court fight, the Upper Colorado River Basin Compact was negotiated to divide the water: Colorado, 51.75 percent; Utah, 23 percent; Wyoming, 14 percent; New Mexico, 11.25 percent, and a flat 50,000 acre-feet to Arizona for the area above Lees Ferry.

The Upper Colorado River Commission was created to represent the upper states—headquarters is now in Salt Lake City—and a move began immediately to authorize a Colorado River Storage Project. A bill introduced in Congress in 1950 got nowhere.

In late 1952 a basinwide development plan was endorsed by the U.S. Interior Department. More bills followed but failed to get executive support until January 1955 when President Eisenhower backed the project in his State of the Union address.

Being proposed was a series of big dams and reservoirs on the upper Colorado and its major tributaries—some $700 million worth—which would store more than 33 million acre-feet and produce more than 1.4 million kilowatts (kw) of electricity (which would be sold to pay for the project).

Also included was the concept of including Congress-approved irrigation districts as "participating projects"—11 originally, 10 more added later. These also would be paid for from project revenues but without interest (power and storage costs would be repaid with interest).

Key parts of the project were a dam on the Colorado in Glen Canyon, 14 miles upstream from Lees Ferry; Flaming Gorge Dam on the Green River in extreme northeastern Utah near the Wyoming-Colorado borders; three dams on the Gunnison River east of Montrose, and Navajo Dam on the San Juan River at the Colorado-New Mexico line.

Screams of protest inundated Congress—from lower basin power and water interests, conservation groups, Eastern anti-reclamation Congressmen and private utility companies. They went like this:

—Power from the proposed hydroelectric power plants—it would be more than the production then of the private utilities in Utah, Colorado or Arizona—"will never be sold."

—Cost of producing the water-generated power is more expensive than using "cheap" coal or even the "unlimited" supplies of "cheap" oil to run generators.

—Problems will be great and costly in constructing transmission lines across the wide expanses of the mountain West.

—Stored water upstream will evaporate, cause losses to the lower basin and eliminate all surplus water.

—Reservoirs will inundate scenic areas, degrade the environment with artificial lakes and threaten at least one national monument (Rainbow Bridge).

The State of California submitted a formal statement, ticking off 14 objections and questioning whether the project was "justified or needed."

Even the Public Service Co. of Colorado, noting that the power would be sold to public authorities and not private companies, attacked the new policy as discriminatory and un-American. Private utilities also objected to federal transmission lines when the project could pay to use their lines.

The validity of those claims—or lack of same—will become evident.

In Congress compromises were made—plans for a dam at Echo Park on the upper Green River were dropped—and on April 11, 1956, the Colorado River Storage Project became part of reclamation law. There were unique features in the act.

The federal government should be totally repaid within 50 years after each unit begins operation. Public authorities, like rural cooperatives and other non-profit associations, will be "preference customers" for wholesale power. Some costs attributable to recreation development and aiding Indian reservations will be "national investments" and don't have to be repaid.

Reclamation Bureau officials moved quickly to get construction started on the two largest dams. The first contract was awarded at Glen Canyon six months after the law was signed. The prime contract was let April 29, 1957, for a 710-foot-high dam to create a 27 million acre-foot reservoir (186-mile-long Lake Powell) that would run eight generators with a capacity of 950,000 kw. Cost: $235 million.

Flaming Gorge work began in January 1957 with the prime contract awarded in June 1958 for a 502-foot dam, 3.8 million acre-foot reservoir and three generators with capacity of 132,000 kw. Cost: $78 million.

Navajo Dam construction began in 1958 on a 405-foot dam for a 1.7 million acre-foot reservoir (no power). Cost: $44 million.

The three dams on the Gunnison River, called the Curecanti unit, didn't break ground until July 1962. Blue Mesa Dam was first—390 feet high for a 940,800 acre-foot reservoir (60,000 kw power plant). Cost: $43 million. Morrow Point Dam was next: 469 feet high with a 117,000 acre-foot reservoir (120,000 kw plant). Cost: $41 million. Curecanti's third dam, Crystal, was begun in 1973 and is expected to begin operation this year. Its 323-foot dam has one generator (28,000 kw) fed by a 26,000 acre-foot reservoir. Cost: $27 million.

As the first buckets of concrete went into Flaming Gorge and Glen Canyon dams in the summer of 1960, the Reclamation Bureau was pondering where to locate the headquarters which would control power operations for the entire project. Denver? Salt Lake City? They seemed likely choices.

An electrical engineer who was chief of the transmission division of the Parker Davis Project near Phoenix, Ariz., Leo Allen DeGuire, was named a consultant for locating the power office. He toured the upper basin.

"I was convinced the operations and maintenance divisions should be kept together," says DeGuire. "The geographical center of the upper basin was Montrose, and there would be three of the dams nearby. That's why I recommended Montrose."

The Bureau went along with DeGuire's recommendation and at a Montrose Chamber of Commerce meeting in October 1962 revealed power dispatching and far-flung communications would originate at the foot of the Uncompahgre Plateau. The chamber was equally impressed with the influx of about 130 project employees and their sizable annual payroll.

Temporary offices were set up in a small building on the north side of town while bids were accepted for constructing a specialized center to house the computerized operation. A $1 million contract for the main building was let in July 1963, just as water storage began in Glen Canyon and Flaming Gorge. (Plant and equipment at Montrose are now valued at more than $5 million.)

DeGuire, the recommender, was back in Montrose in mid-1963—as maintenance division chief. After 1968 he would be power operations manager, the top post.

Flaming Gorge got one of its three generators "on line" Nov. 11, 1963, to produce the first Colorado River Storage Project (CRSP) power. Glen Canyon's first generation was Sept. 4, 1964. Montrose dispatchers, in their new center at 1200 S. Rio Grande Ave., had something to dispatch.

Bureau transmission lines went up to make the first connections between Utah and Arizona and between Utah and New Mexico. These were 230,000-volt lines. Other Bureau lines—from 115,000 to 345,000 volts—formed a CRSP system linking Flaming Gorge to Cheyenne and northern Colorado; Glen Canyon to Shiprock, N.M., and southern Arizona; Curecanti units to Salida and Midway (between Pueblo and Colorado Springs); all of them to the Montrose headquarters. That amounts to some 1,500 miles of transmission lines (now tied into the entire Western power network).

In the Montrose center, dispatchers and schedulers see that the customers get the power they contract for. Computers scan the performance of each generator every six seconds—around the clock—and send out corrections automatically in trying to match the load to the demand.

They also lend and borrow power, keeping track of "what we owe the world and what the world owes us." The "world" is anywhere outside the CRSP system. Exchanging or buying available power permits the project to conserve its water since "keeping water in the river" is another obligation. Borrowed power may be paid back at peak daytime periods.

Under the project law, first call for water goes to irrigators, with any leftover being sold to municipal and industrial users. There are 18 water district contracts. Power customers number 75, including 19 in Colorado.

Contrary to the dire predictions of the protesters, all of the project's power was sold out by 1969—and has been sold out since. (Twice as much could be sold now but Congress hasn't authorized any expansion to meet the demand.) Twenty percent goes to Arizona in summer (less in winter); the rest goes to the upper states; none goes to California.

As for claims that hydroelectric power would be more expensive, cost of project energy from the start has been lower than any coal-fired generation (six mills, or .6 cent, per kilowatt hour in 1963 and only 6.55 mills now; that is less than half of some private utility wholesale rates; the retail average cost to a Denver resident is 3.6 cents per kilowatt hour).

Marketing the project's wares is the job of John W. Mueller, power manager in the regional office at Salt Lake City. He makes the contracts that the Montrose office executes.

Mueller has seen power revenues rise from $5 million a year the first two start-up years to a peak in 1976 of $61.9 million. Last year's drought—the runoff was 27 percent of average—curtailed power income to $41 million.

The first 14 revenue-producing years shattered another doubt of the 1950s about future success. Since 1964, CRSP revenues have totaled $397 million. From this, $230 million have been returned to the U.S. Treasury in principal and interest. The rest has paid operational expenses. Mueller says that by any standard, CRSP stands for success.

The telephone rang at 6:30 a.m. last Feb. 2 at Richard Schlosser's Montrose home. Paul Hughart, a dispatcher on the early shift at the CRSP operations center, was on the line.

"We're having some system problems," Hughart said.

Schlosser, chief of the power dispatching and operations branch, could have guessed as much. His electric alarm clock, set for 6:15 a.m., didn't go off.

Normally, Hughart and Larry Burke, the other dispatcher, could handle most situations—switching power sources, making generation match fluctuating loads, adjusting customer schedules. But a power outage followed by a flood of puzzling information led to a call for help.

There had been a break in power from the Delta-Montrose Electric Association which serves most needs of the center (CRSP buys electricity like any other customer). The outage triggered the center's auxiliary generators (computers and microwave communication facilities have an uninterruptible supply from DC batteries).

Schlosser and his colleagues assimilated facts gathered from other dispatching centers—PSC at Table Mountain in Golden, Lower Missouri Region at Loveland, Utah Power & Light at Salt Lake City, Arizona Public Service at Phoenix.

A sudden outage had occurred at 6:02 a.m. when "something"—still unknown after three months—caused a 230,000-volt line between the Dave Johnston power plant near Casper and the Stegall substation on the Nebraska-Wyoming line near Cheyenne to open. It stayed open (line remained in fault, the engineers say).

When the high voltage sought another avenue—like water, seeking a path of least resistance—it overloaded a series of interconnected lines, in domino fashion. An early report of a faulty breaker at Stegall substation was wrong; it operated under overload as it was supposed to.

But then 115,000-volt lines between Cheyenne and two southern Wyoming plants, Seminoe and Kortes, also opened. Next came CRSP lines—138,000 volts between Vernal, Rangely and Hayden; 115,000 volts from Shiprock to Durango; 230,000 volts from Shiprock to the Curecanti unit lines.

"We could conclude from our instruments in the control center that our problems were caused by overload conditions," says Schlosser. "It was a cascading action from someplace else. There would be several stages in solving the problem."

Almost all of Colorado plus parts of Wyoming, North Dakota, Nebraska, Utah and Kansas became an energy-deficient island. The complex system of interconnected lines maintained power to most people on the "island"; 160,000 customers lost power.

At that early morning hour Colorado was importing energy from outside the region and the outage to the north was felt immediately. As generation dropped, interruptible loads were shed automatically.

Within minutes all available CRSP generators were put in service to help replace declining power. (Coal-fired plants can require days to get a generator to peak capacity.)

Attempts to close the open lines and restore the power network seemed to succeed, but three times the overload tripped the breakers again. When a generator at Hayden tripped out, a major loss to the system of 250,000 kw compounded the problem. (It took this "happening" to disclose faulty wiring in the Hayden unit.)

Schlosser and his men realized what was happening and stopped trying to close the Shiprock and Curecanti lines. As engineers throughout the region worked feverishly to restore the network, one from Gering, Neb., by passed a breaker at Stegall and the system was put back together—at 9:11 a.m.

The CRSP couldn't stop or prevent the outages but it could—and did—within minutes switch on extra units at Blue Mesa, Morrow Point and Flaming Gorge to provide all available hydroelectric power—nearly 1 million kw—to help restore power wherever it was needed.

"We put on all we had in the area and loaded up," says Schlosser. "It was a real bad breakdown in a way because it happened so many times. No one person can see it all in an interconnected system. The East is ahead of us with their coordinating center and super dispatching office."

He emphasized that with loads building up in many areas, like in Denver, the energy suppliers are "at the mercy of the transmission system."

"Generation is not keeping up because of the long delays in approval and red tape," he says, "The environmental type plugs in his appliances and then goes out to protest. Leadtime on a steam plant is seven or eight years."

Ivan Smith, power operations manager at the PSC Table Mountain center, compiled a minute-to-minute report on the Feb. 2 outages. Experiences of power agencies throughout the area might help the Western Systems Coordinating Council, an industry advisory organization, find new operating standards to minimize future outages.

We're still undergoing a learning process," says Smith. We had a lack of information to the dispatch centers on overloads, particularly the loading on the major ties. There was inadequate communication between the Bureau and the utilities. But we are reinforcing our facilities with a minimum of two paths of communication."

While the exact cause of the outage may never be known, Smith and others noted a high north-to-south power flow that morning totaling 600,000 kw over limited transmission facilities. By agreement, the maximum now is 450,000 kw.

Despite the Western drought in 1977, California and the lower basin got their water as CRSP reservoirs permitted the release of 8.2 million acre-feet. As of last Oct. 1, an estimated 19.6 million acre-feet were still in storage. A big runoff this spring should approach capacity (31.4 million).

Although generation was down last year because less water was available (4.9 billion kwh compared to 5.7 billion kwh in 1976), and power income dropped to $41 million, the U.S. Treasury still got $12.4 million in CRSP payments. That leaves an unpaid balance of "only" $650 million.

If all authorized participating projects are completed, like the Dallas Creek, Dolores and West Divide in Colorado, the reimbursable investment will rise to $2.4 billion. CRSP financial statements say payment of power investment that carries interest will be completed by the year 2000, and that all irrigation investment will be paid by 2050, as required.

As if the water and energy business of the West weren't complex enough in the Reclamation Bureau, it was divided in two last Oct. 1. President Carter created the Department of Energy (DOE) which, among other things, took over power marketing functions from the Bureau "to promote efficiency" in the national energy program.

This meant most CRSP facilities at Montrose were transferred to the new department, including 90 of the 130 Bureau employees. The same operator at the same phone number now answers, "Department of Energy," instead of "Bureau of Reclamation."

In December DOE created the Western Area Power Administration (WAPA) to supervise its new 14-state domain with its 16,235 miles of lines and 7.4 million kw capacity. Headquarters will be in Denver—somewhere. Functions are still being performed in the Reclamation Bureau at the Federal Center, with an acting administrator in Billings, Robert L. McPhail, awaiting confirmation by Congress.

Reclamation Bureau personnel still run CRSP dams. But with construction, operation and maintenance of transmission lines under DOE authority, a score card is needed to determine which team is up. Ex-Bureau veterans—DOE newcomers—just shake their head and continue doing what they have always done—more efficiently, according to Washington.

The next great quagmire—it is already here—will be restructuring rates for power and energy. What is the proper charge for the capital investment in making generation available, and what is the proper charge for energy used at different hours?

In Montrose where the "world" is outside, the CRSP personnel continue providing water and energy to some 2 million Westerners, keeping water in the river to make the lower basin happy and staying alert for the next outage. There will be no letup.

"It will get a lot worse before it gets better," says DeGuire. "People can't depend on natural gas or oil. So they will turn more and more to electricity."

The CRSP power—just a byproduct of an irrigation and water-control project 20 years ago—gets more attractive daily. What other type of generation starts quickly, runs on a renewable resource, never pollutes the air or water, rarely breaks down and even contributes to the recreation, water and food supply of millions?

Yes, they are looking for some more CRSPs. If they find any, I wonder what the objections will be.●

A CRITICAL MESSAGE FOR AMERICA FROM GEN. JOHN SINGLAUB

HON. STEVEN D. SYMMS

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. Speaker, the most profound, and most profoundly alarming, message I can remember on the critical condition of our national security has just been made public through an interview with Maj. Gen. John K. Singlaub, who ironically takes off his uniform and enters retirement from the Army today.

His vastly knowledgeable candor is in such stark contrast to the silence and evasion of his professional comrades, which I have decried in recent weeks, and the Nation is deeply indebted to him and to Spotlight, the publication of Liberty Lobby, for the great public service this represents. Combine Paul Revere and Billy Mitchell and all the other patriots who have alerted their fellow citizens to impending calamity, and you cannot begin to equal the import and the impact of this tremendous warning.

I do not merely call it to your attention, or commend it to your reading. I urge you, I implore you, for the sake of this Republic and freedom everywhere, study General Singlaub's words, take them to heart, and make them a part of your prayerful decisionmaking in the critical days ahead:

GENERAL SINGLAUB SPEAKS OUT . . . AND IT IS A GRIM WARNING TO AMERICA

(By George Nicholas)

"A fine military officer and a great patriot" was how Sen. Barry Goldwater described Major General John K. Singlaub (Spotlight, May 22, 1978).

This week we are pleased to bring our readers, in the form of an exclusive interview with staff correspondent George Nicholas, the first public statement of this distinguished commander since his summary and vindictive retirement from the crucially important post he held as chief of staff, U.S. Army Forces Command at Ft. McPherson (FORSCOM).

The circumstances in which General Singlaub abruptly ended one of the most remarkable and promising Army careers in American military history are well known today: in fact, they have made him a national figure with a rapidly growing following.

"What we have here," Sen. Goldwater commented, "is a brave and courageous man willing to stand out alone among his fellow officers and declare what he feels to be right."

In fact, General Singlaub sought to arouse no public attention or response with his remarks, which were uttered at a private talk, before a military audience, in answer to a direct question from one of the ROTC cadets in the audience. But once challenged to state his own personal view of recent administration decisions to give away our Panama Canal, shelve the neutron bomb and scrap the B-1 bomber, General Singlaud would not equivocate, waffle or dissemble in the approved manner we have become accustomed to hearing from the political guardians of our national security; in a few simple and candid words, the general told the truth. By this act itself, General Singlaub stands alone, in a special place of honor, gallantry and exceptional merit, amid the evasiveness and cant of our vast defense bureaucracy, who were startled to hear the truth if only because they had so long ago lost the habit of uttering it.

MANY PERILOUS MISSIONS

General Singlaub has always been a "soldier's soldier," a fighting officer and combat leader who put honor and duty to the nation above bureaucratic caution. Commissioned a second lieutenant at the outset of World War II, he was posted to the European Theater where he parachuted deep into enemy territory and organized French resistance forces behind German lines as an OSS team leader. In 1944—having demonstrated exceptional ability and gallantry, as well as outstanding qualities of leadership in the performance of this singularly hazardous assignment—the young officer was transferred to the China-Burma-India Theater where he jumped behind Japanese lines to rally and direct Chinese guerrilla formations in a series of highly effective special operations under the very noses of the enemy.

World War II ended in 1945, but the shooting did not stop for John Singlaub, who found himself occupying a risky intelligence command deep in Manchuria, in the thick of the Chinese civil war. Then came the fierce, bloody Korean action: Singlaub fought it on the front lines as an infantry battalion commander. Only with a temporary lull in worldwide hostilities did he find himself stateside in the more conventional sort of post: on the faculty of the Command and General Staff College at Ft. Leavenworth; an alumnus of the Air War College; another tour in Europe, then a stint with the Army staff in Washington.

When the Vietnam crisis grew hot in the early 60s, General Singlaub found himself in yet another risky and responsible unconventional warfare command in Indochina. Then came a tour in Germany; another one in the office of the secretary of defense in the Pentagon; a stint as readiness region commander in Denver, involving work with the Army National Guard and Army Reserves; then a tour as chief of staff of the United Nations Command in Korea, 1967-77.

CRITICIZED WITHDRAWALS

After giving voice to personal doubts concerning the Carter Administration's unilateral decision to withdraw the bulk of U.S. forces from Korea—doubts which are fully spelled out in the general's own words for the first time in the interview which follows—Gen. Singlaub was recalled from Korea but given a key command: that of chief of staff, FORSCOM. When, however, he was overheard—somewhat against his own intentions—expressing honest and realistic views on the perilous state of our national security a second time—albeit before a strictly military audience—Gen. John Singlaub was abruptly summoned to Washington. What happened next the general related to The Spotlight in his own words:

"As a result of answering some questions on a military subject from ROTC cadets—and answering then truthfully—as my own personal opinion, I encountered some dissatisfaction from the administration, which created enough embarrassment to the Army that I felt the only honorable thing to do was to submit my request for voluntary retirement."

These are the mild and generous words of a great general who voices no grievance and seeks no redress for the irrational and hysterical pressures generated by a few, measured and well-phrased reservations concerning the catastrophic state of our national security—reservations voiced before a closed military audience and disclosed only by utter inadvertence. But for all of General Singlaub's modesty and reticence, the nation knows where the truth stands and where the real guilty parties lie.

"I say the wrong man resigned," commented Sen. Goldwater on hearing of General Singlaub's retirement. But let the Carter Administration's ruthless bureaucratic enforcers note that General John Singlaub—combat infantryman, master parachutist, Army aviator, Ranger and leader of American soldiers in five separate shooting wars—has merely resigned from the Army's active list; he has not retired from public affairs, nor ended a lifetime of service to the nation. In coming months and years his voice will be heard and his presence felt wherever the vital questions of our dangerously enfeebled, disastrously neglected national security are discussed and decided.

Henceforth, if the American people demand to know the facts about the sellout of their interests and the betrayal of their national security, there will be the fearless voice of General Singlaub to tell them the truth. And soon enough—sooner than the poltroons and politicians of the Carter clique think—the American people may decide to retire forever from public life the real culprits of our national betrayal.

THE INTERVIEW

Although your abrupt "retirement" last month from one of the Army's top force commands has been attributed by the establishment media to your "outspoken" remarks concerning the Pentagon's troop withdrawal from South Korea and the shelving of the neutron bomb, in reality your public comments on these and other defense matters have been brief and guarded so far. But now that you have an opportunity—the first one in a lifetime of dedicated service to the nation—to speak out without restraint, would you tell The Spotlight's readers whether recent administration policies have in fact relegated the United States to a position of military inferiority vis-a-vis the communists? Is it true that America has become a second-class power?

General SINGLAUB. "Yes, an alarming strategic imbalance in favor of the communist bloc known as the Warsaw Pact alliance has arisen as the result of our disregard of vital strategic interests, our neglect of required force structures and our unrealistic levels of defense spending. Speaking as an Army officer with long experience, I must say that Soviet armaments are now not just quantitatively but also qualitatively superior to our own—an unprecedented humiliation for the U.S., whose past hegemony was based in part on our uncontested technological leadership. Viewed in the aggregate, our defense posture over the past two or three years can only be described as unilateral disarmament. There is no question that in terms of military strength and strategic resources, the communists have risen to first place over us.

But Administration spokesmen suggest that only by adopting this sort of conciliatory and deferential approach can we hope to soften the Soviets to espouse detente—that is, a relaxation of cold-war tensions—and enter productive arms-control negotiations with us. Have you noticed any signs of Soviet responsiveness along these lines?

General SINGLAUB. "No, there are no visible indications that our attempts to humor and appease the Soviets are producing any reciprocal gestures of communist pacifism. In fact, the contrary is true: our misguided and illogical defense policies are encouraging the Soviets and their surrogates to stage ever more aggressive and expansionist global scenarios in Africa, the Middle East, and elsewhere. Of course, it cannot be otherwise. The example of history tells us that when you allow one side among potential adversaries to acquire a decisive military edge, you cannot hope to preserve peace: this is how wars are started. Our irrational and inadequate defense policies, our hesitancy in asserting our vital strategic interests, our appeasement-minded giveaways are leading our opponents to the belief that they can get away with murder. This is the certain road to global conflagration and thermonuclear war."

Fidel Castro, foremost among the surrogate Soviet shock troops, has been allowed—by U.S. absenteeism—to score heady victories in Angola and Ethiopia. Will Communist Cuba now renew the demand that we hand over our naval base at Guantanamo?

General SINGLAUB. "By every report, Castro is greatly stimulated by his African exploits and by the U.S. giveaway of our historic Panama Canal command. He may well decide that the time is ripe for another grab at the American naval base on Guantanamo Bay. And if Castro does, for all I know, the White House may decide, in the spirit of detente, that he should have it."

Do the Joint Chiefs agree with these policies, and if not, do they have the freedom to make their dissent known?

General SINGLAUB. "Well, I cannot speak for the views held by the Joint Chiefs, but I can tell you that according to Secretary of Defense Harold Brown, senior officers who dissent do have one freedom: to resign."

We hear incessant rumors, and as often as not from knowledgeable and trustworthy inside sources, that behind the Pentagon's "consensus curtain" there is a great deal of concern and dissent among senior service commanders. The American public, instead of being told the truth about our critical situation, is being fed a stream of propaganda, slogans and myths by administration publicists. What is the truth?

General SINGLAUB. "Well, one thing I can confirm is the existence of widely propagated "defense myths" that do a lot of harm whatever their origin. One of these myths is that the Soviets, like ourselves, consider all-out nuclear war "unthinkable"—an option only a madman would invoke. But in reality—although the American public has not been told of this—we have hard information indicating that the Soviet high command by no means views all-out thermonuclear conflict as an "unthinkable" contingency. They think about it a great deal; in fact, they don't merely meditate on it, they are devising strategic scenarios for the launching, fighting and winning of a nuclar campaign against the U.S.

"Another defense myth sold to the American public is the assumption that chemical-biological warfare—involving poison gas and deadly germs—has been abandoned by all major powers. We here in the United States have done so—foresworn the use of chemical or biological agents in combat and destroyed the bulk of our existing stockpiles of such substances. Research and development on CBW projects was cancelled in toto by presidential order. Having set a moral example with all this, Washington fully expected the Soviets to follow suit. But our adversaries did nothing of the sort. There are reliable intelligence indicators that the Soviets have sharply stepped up their CBW research and development programs and that they are stockpiling deadly bacteria and viruses for "use against the Soviet Union's ememies" in case of war. Here we have the result of a widely disseminated defense myth: an entire branch of warfare in which Soviet superiority is absolute and U.S. inferiority total."

Do such "defense myths" arise spontaneously, or with the aid of administration and media propagandists?

General SINGLAUB. "You only have to trace the genesis of such a defense myth to realize that it does not spring spontaneously from the heavens. Take the myth that "We cannot ever again become involved in an Asian land war." When this myth first began to circulate, toward the end of the ill-starred Vietnam war, it was endorsed, not by just the usual coterie of establishment "defense analysts" and "policy scholars" but by an unexpected dove, North Korea's Communist dictator Kim Il Sung. Neurotic and megalomaniac, Kim Il Sung has long been known as the proponent of a single war doctrine: that South Korea must be reunified as a single communist peninsula under his personal control. But in early 1972 we suddenly began to hear strange, soothing sounds from North Korea. Detente was in the air. The Communist North Koreans opened a series of negotiations with the anti-communist, U.S.-backed South Koreans. These negotiations, Kim Il Sung declared, would generate a mutually satisfactory settlement to the Korean problem so that the U.S. need never become involved in an Asian land war again. Well, Washington was pleased as punch. In early 1971 we had withdrawn the U.S. 7th Division from South Korea, and now the buzz went around U.S. policymaking circles: "Here it is! The Communists are responding to our peace overtures! Detente is going global! There'll be no more major wars in the Far East!"

Unfortunately for all this official optimism, Kim Il Sung never meant a word of it. While he lulled Washington with a series of "peace talks" he was secretly preparing for war—by all signs, offensive war. Beginning in 1972, the North Koreans embarked on an intensive, immensely costly rearmament program that concentrated on military hardware required only in wars of aggression. The North Korean high command moved up its heavy artillery units into concrete-hardened emplacements right along the frontier, for maximum reach into South Korea. They doubled the number of their fighter aircraft and tanks, tripled their mobile armor and increased four-fold the number of amphibious assault craft—a purely offensive piece of equipment. Having deployed their 120 mm howitzers and 130 mm siege guns and FROG missiles along the border, Kim Il Sung backed them up with many military airfields moved up front and concealed in reinforced underground hangars and with hardened tank sites dug deep in mountains along the border. He built 12 ocean-going attack summarines—South Korea has not a single one—and emplaced them in forward berths shielded by concrete and anti-aircraft batteries. He vastly expanded the war production capacity of North Korea; almost all of the weaponry we have discussed here, even the subs, while designed in the USSR were actually built in North Korea. Finally, the North Koreans began digging tunnels under the DMZ. They also sent teams of secret agents to South Korea to stir up the kind of trouble that would eventually touch off an armed conflict. You can see why I said that withdrawing our forces from South Korea might lead to war. In fact, it is an act of folly."

Does the presence of strong and combat-ready U.S. defense forces make a crucial difference in such a situation?

General SINGLAUB. Indeed it does. First of all, Kim Il Sung, for all his compulsive power-drive, might himself hesitate to push the button for all-out war that instantly embroils him in a shoot-out with the U.S. Moreover, his patrons—the Soviet Union and Red China—may well restrain him for the time being from triggering total war—something Moscow might decide to set off by its own actions, when the moment is ripe, but not by proxy. The same reasoning holds in Europe, where our NATO forces have been seriously undercut by the withdrawal of their support echelons. Here the currently prevailing official myth is that if an emergency hits, we can always summon up the reserves. But the real-time, lightning-fast scenario of modern nuclear conflict will allow no time for old-fashioned mobilization; it will erupt over our heads like thunder and lightning. Thus it is essential that we maintain adequate force structures, both in the Far East and in Europe.

Does that include deployment of the neutron bomb?

General SINGLAUB. It does. That production of the enhanced radiation weapon, the so-called neutron bomb, can be put off indefinitely, is another myth. What the American public is not told is that in heavy tanks, as well as other armored fighting vehicles, the Soviets hold a 5-to-1 superiority over us. The neutron bomb is our best anti-tank weapon right now; it should become part of our defense arsenal without a day's delay.

5-to-1 sounds like an awesome edge for the communists to be holding over our heads. Have things come down to this sorry state?

General SINGLAUB. They have. I feel certain the American public doesn't even suspect the real deterioration in our defenses—our indefenses, to use the apt term for them. Our main battle tank, the M–60, is hopelessly outdated; its Soviet counterpart, the T–72, is technologically almost three generations ahead. We have a projected new battle tank, the XM–1, and it's a good piece of armor. But its production is being dangerously delayed—just like the neutron bomb, only even more so. It is indispensable for our army's combat capability that the XM–1 be committed to full-scale production without further foot-dragging. We are also in dire need of a new generation of infantry fighting vehicles. The M–133 was a good armored troop carrier 20 years ago, but now it's way outclassed by comparable Soviet-bloc equipment. And it's not just the rolling stock that's outdated. At Ft. Bragg some troops are still housed in wooden sheds built during World War II—for that matter, here at Ft. McPherson we use buildings dating back to the 19th century—and with construction lagging nationwide, the time has come to modernize our accommodations.

Where do our most urgent priorities arise—abroad or here at home?

General SINGLAUB. In global terms, we face a grave crisis. Our failure to act in a consistent and logical way in Africa, our unwillingness and unpreparedness to live up to our historic role—that of the leading power and champion of the free world—in Europe and elsewhere, has encouraged the Soviet Union and its surrogates, mainly Cuba and East Germany, to their present level of aggressive and expansionist activity. They are following reckless policies, moving military forces into areas of the world where the communist bloc has had traditionally no influence to speak of. That, in my opinion, is the fatal road to World War III. But our key priorities and most crucial challenges lie right here at home. We must not merely revise our defense appropriations but our thinking in the vital area of national security.

Now that you are free to explain the facts to all Americans, and perhaps assume your preordained role in the process of rethinking our national priorities, may we hope that you will do so, General?

General SINGLAUB. Right now, I can only say that I do intend to take a hand in this urgent national reappraisal. I hope to be able to continue to serve our country, perhaps at first working with organizations that share my concern over that state of our national security.

THE PRESIDENT'S DILEMMA IN AFRICA

HON. DON BONKER

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, conflicts which have been simmering in Africa for several years are now claiming global significance culminating in a new and dangerous chasm between the superpowers. Events in recent days have the sense of a growing, if not imminent, crisis, threatening both détente and the administration's efforts to establish a new and viable African policy. African countries are also confronted with the grim prospect of East/West frictions being played out in places like Eritrea, Angola, Zaire, and Zimbabwe at the expense of African interest, often with the shedding of African blood. Americans are being told that our country has suffered important policy reverses in countries which few knew existed a short time ago. How significant these reverses are to vital U.S. national interests is difficult to ascertain in the present emotionally charged atmosphere.

The President faces a dilemma, partly of his own making. He must appear to be strong and effective in countering Soviet and Cuban designs in Africa but not in a way which will alienate relations with important African Countries and with no apparent show of force to back up his rhetoric. And the choices before President Carter are not all that attractive. Nor does the United States have a tremendous amount of leverage in coping with sporadic crises in that continent. Fiery statements from administration spokesmen only increase the possibility of the United States overreacting at some point, which could precipitate another Vietnam commitment. We wisely avoided that mistake in the Horn of Africa, but who is to say it will not happen in other African hotspots. CIA Director Stansfield Turner's visit on Capitol Hill to explore the possibility of supplying military support (through third countries) to guerrilla factions in Angola, supposedly to keep the Cubans occupied there, is one grim example. This is an ominous reminder of the CIA of old, but it certainly is no way to conduct foreign policy.

In addition to lambasting the Russians and the Cubans, the President has also openly worried about so-called congressional restraints on his ability to respond effectively to recent events in Africa. One can admittedly share President Carter's frustration over his inability to respond to Russian-Cuban initiatives in Africa, but Congress is not the problem. To date there has been no legitimate reason or circumstance that could justify our direct involvement in Africa; even if there were, it is doubtful the administration would commit us to matching Russian-Cuban adventurism with American adventurism on an endless "tit for tat" basis. Communist countries do not have public reaction to contend with in their foreign policy and besides it is unlikely the American people will again support extensive U.S. involvement in a remote and vast continent.

The major problem of U.S. policy in Africa is not congressional restraints on Presidential action (which, for the most part, make extensive allowances when U.S. national security is involved), but the absence of a clear sense of what our Government's goals are in Africa or a well-articulated vision of what the U.S. role should be on the continent.

U.S. policy in Africa today is still in a state of transition—from the post-colonial era of identifying with our European Allies (most of whom happened to be the colonial powers) to a more African-oriented policy of supporting liberation efforts, particularly in southern Africa, which the Soviets have been doing all along.

In the midst of all the rhetoric emanating from the White House, thus far the United States has pursued prudent and well-measured actions in responding to conflicts in Africa. But the President could also do much more to respond to the destabilizing consequences of the Soviet-Cuban presence in Africa while minimizing the likelihood of that continent becoming a battleground for East/West proxy wars. U.S. policy should be directed to helping these countries band together and develop a capability of responding collectively to common threats.

There is an impressive body of testimony which suggests that the United States could offer a viable alternative to countries with a significant Cuban presence rather than simply writing them off as lost causes. Russia's scorecard in Africa is not all that impressive, despite the media's preoccupation with Russian gains there. Former Russian clients like Sudan, Egypt, Somalia, and North Yemen all have a bitter dislike and distrust of the U.S.S.R. Africa may well turn out to be Russia's Vietnam.

A few years ago, the National Security Council warned Congress that Russia's two African surrogates, Somalia and Guinea, posed security problems for the United States. At the time, both of these coastal states had Soviet-built port and air facilities that were used for their naval and reconnaissance missions. It turned out to be a poor investment for the Russians as they were thrown out of Somalia earlier this year and are on their way out of Guinea.

Another possibility would be for the United States to focus more on the Soviet rather than the Cuban presence as a source of concern. Africans are finding the Russians can get pretty arrogant, if not outright racist, in their dealings with Third World countries. One wonders whether the Soviet presence in Africa would be that significant if somehow the United States would not be so paranoid about the Russian-Cuban axis and concentrate on the social and economic forces that logically bring us together.

At the very least, the administration should refrain from foreclosing some of these options by playing so heavily into the knee-jerk reactions which have surrounded the Soviet and Cuban presence in Africa. Let the United States be on the African side and pursue those policies that will benefit Africans and not overreact to Communist-inspired activities, they represent no serious threat to our national security.

The Communists, for their part, will eventually be recognized for what they really are—neocolonialists—and will soon discover that Africans do not make good Marxists. When all the politicking and fighting have subsided, Africans are going to be Africans regardless of what the superpowers do in that continent.●

AMENDING THE IMPACT AID PROGRAM

HON. WILLIAM F. GOODLING

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, I rise to offer an amendment regarding the impact aid program reauthorized in title X of H.R. 15.

Since I have been in Congress I have been a consistent opponent of the impact aid program. In my view, much of the program has no economic justification. I refer particularly to those portions of the act authorized in section 3(b) of Public Law 874 which make payments to school districts on behalf of children of civilian Government employees.

Let me make it clear, however, that I, too, support payments to school districts on behalf of military personnel who either live on military property or in an adjacent community. The Soldiers and Sailors Relief Act through its provisions essentially denies States and communities from benefits or significant tax revenue for military personnel, thereby imposing a burden on the educational system in those areas.

However, these same facts do not exist with respect to civilian employees. They live exclusively in private residences which generate property taxes. They do not have access to commissaries and PX's (which are exempt from sales taxation), and they are not excused from the payment of State income taxes. In short, civilian Federal employees do not impose an economic burden on the communities in which they reside or work.

As a matter of fact, it is my view that Federal employees bring to a community a considerable number of advantages as evidenced by the struggles which go on within this body over the location of Federal offices. For the most part, Federal personnel are much more highly paid than the average State and local worker and, in many cases, more highly paid than those in private industry. They, therefore, generate a considerable amount of revenue for the States and communities where they are located.

Because I do not feel that it is possible to eliminate payments for these civilian employees overnight, the amendment which I have offered would reduce payments over a 6-year period, beginning with fiscal 1979. Each year the payments would be reduced by one-sixth so that by fiscal 1984 payment would be entirely eliminated for these students.

According to cost calculations done by the Congressional Research Service of the Library of Congress, this amendment would reduce entitlements an estimated $129 million in fiscal 1979 and by the time of its full implementation in fiscal 1984, would reduce entitlements under Public Law 874 by $1.2 billion. However, even with these reductions, payment levels through tier 2 would be almost identical with estimated payments under the current law in fiscal 1979.

I commend the amendment to my colleagues and urge its adoption:

AMENDMENT TO H.R. 15

Page 270 strike out lines 14 through 17 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(i) five-sixths of such actual number for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979;

"(ii) four-sixths of such actual number for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1980;

"(iii) three-sixths of such actual number for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1981;

"(iv) two-sixths of such actual number for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982; and

"(v) one-sixth of such actual number for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1983, and for any fiscal year beginning on or after October 1, 1983, the number of children determined under such paragraphs shall, for purposes of paragraph (1) of this subsection, be deemed to be zero.●

HAPPY BIRTHDAY BOB HOPE

HON. JOHN B. ANDERSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, Bob Hope has been called an American institution and as such I believe it is appropriate to have him in Washington to honor him for his 75th birthday. It is indeed refreshing to have a national institution come to this city without asking for Federal funds. To list all of Bob Hope's accomplishments is a task we should leave to those who have the time to publish many tomes. More important than his accomplishments though, Bob Hope retains a spot at the core of every American's affections and especially the millions of servicemen to whom he selflessly gave his time, spirit and heart during Christmas for so many years. He is a man who not only fulfills the promise of his name but who throws a large measure of generosity and charity along with it. In fact, Bob Hope hoards only one thing, his eternal youth.●

RICE FOR LAOS

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, earlier this week the administration announced its intention to donate 10,000 tons of rice to Laos under title II of the Public Law 480 program.

The administration states that this $5 million of aid is being granted as a humanitarian gesture to a country which has been stricken by a severe drought. It is estimated that Laos needs 112,975 tons of foodstuffs to offset their drought losses; 80,00 to 90,000 tons already having been pledged by private organizations and governments, our donation will come close to fulfilling the Laotian needs.

This grant demonstrates the continuing commitment by the United States to human rights and basic humanitarian aid. The United States has consistently fulfilled its international obligation to aid in emergency situations. However, the Laotian Government has failed to fulfill its international obligation to give a complete and accurate reporting of any MIA's in their country.

Our Nation has repeatedly requested such information, and have sent to the Laotian Government files on 49 MIA's in Laos. We have received no reply.

It is hoped that the Carter administration will take into account the humanitarian aspects of the unresolved MIA issue in considering any future aid to Laos and insist that any improvement in our relations with that nation and any aid beyond that which addresses emergency needs, be contingent upon a full accounting of our MIA's and adherence to international agreements on human rights.

The Congress has recently expressed its wholehearted concern for our MIA's in H.R. 538, a resolution which I authored, calling upon the President to request a U.N. investigation of the MIA problem. In addition, the Congress has refused aid to Vietnam due to its lack of cooperation on the MIA problem.

It is my hope that our foreign policy and aid commitments to countries such as Laos and Vietnam, which have withheld information on our missing servicemen, will in the future reflect the high priority which we place on a full accounting.●

THE ROAD TO PROSPERITY—PART V—ONE MORE ANALYSIS OF THE INVESTMENT INCENTIVE ACT

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. STEIGER. Mr. Speaker, yesterday's RECORD contained an economic analysis of the Investment Incentive Act by Merrill Lynch Economics. It is one of four analyses that have been done on the act. Today, I want to include in the RECORD the fourth analysis.

This analysis has been prepared by Norman Ture. Dr. Ture has been working with the National Association of Manufacturers to develop an econometric model for analyzing and measuring the effects of taxes and changes in the tax laws on our economy. The NAM Tax Impact Project Task Force has been working since 1974 to construct this model.

The work by Ture and TIP is perhaps the first to measure the direct effects of tax changes on the supply of labor and capital services. People do not engage in economic activity for purely altruistic motives. There have to be rewards and incentives. In economic terms, the greater the reward, the more people would be willing to expend on a particular activity. On the other hand, disincentives will discourage economic activity.

Whether we like it or not, taxes are a disincentive. If people feel their labor is subject to a high tax, they will not work as hard. If individuals feel that their savings—their capital stock—is subject to a high tax, they will consume, not save. Or, they will invest in any available tax shelter, even if it is uneconomical, merely to avoid paying high taxes. If the tax burden is relieved, the opposite effect occurs. People will work harder and save more.

These are facts of life which are not measured in the revenue estimates which are done by the Treasury Department on tax legislation. These facts cannot be ignored. At least some attempts are being made to provide a realistic basis for legislating on taxes. For instance, Chase Econometrics, DRI, Merrill Lynch Economics and Ture-TIP have sought to develop objective measures of the economic impact on a change in the capital gains tax. Economics is still an art, not a science, so the effort is not the final step in the process. At the moment, it is the best we have. I hope the Members will find this information useful when we consider the Investment Incentive Act.

The analysis follows:

Subject: Effects of H.R. 12111 on the Economy and on Federal Tax Revenues.

Enactment of H.R. 12111, restoring the pre-1969 alternative tax treatment of net long-term capital gains and eliminating capital gains as a preference item for minimum tax, would have a significant expansionary effect on the economy and would modestly increase Federal tax revenues. Assuming the bill's enactment as of the beginning of 1978, full-time equivalent employment would increase by 90,000 over the levels projected under present law for 1978 (although the provisions of the bill would not be effective until January 1, 1980, the saving and investment response by both individuals and corporations would initiate with enactment of the legislation); in 1987, there would be 150,000 more full-time equivalent employed persons than the projected present-law level.

This increase in jobs would reflect both the increase in the demand for and supply of labor services resulting from the net additions to the stock of business capital in response to the reduction in the overall marginal rate of tax on capital income effected by H.R. 12111. The estimated response would be an $8 billion increase in gross capital outlays in the first year, increasing to $19 billion in the fifth year as adjustment to the lower cost of saving and of capital was completed; on the new, higher growth path of the economy, gross capital outlays would be $13 billion more than under present law 10 years hence; net capital additions would be $6 billion more (measured in constant 1977 dollars).

These larger additions to the amount of business capital would increase the productivity of labor and real wage rates—by $90 a year in the first year, increasing to $150 a year 10 years later (in constant 1977 dollars). Together with the increase in the gross returns to the larger stock of capital, the increased labor income resulting from the expansion in employment and in real wage rates would raise GNP by $12 billion over the present-law level in the first year and by $27 billion 10 years later (measured in constant 1977 dollars). Of this increase in GNP, the increase in total real wages would amount to about $10 billion in the first year, rising to about $19 billion in 1987.

In response to the reduction in tax on the returns on investment, individuals would increase their saving by increasing amounts during the first five years. In the fifth year, as the adjustment was completed, consumption outlays would be slightly less than under present law, although greater than in the previous year. Thereafter consumption would increase; 10 years after enactment, consumption spending would be about $14 billion greater than under present law.

The initial-impact revenue effect would be to reduce Federal tax revenues by about $2 billion in 1980 and by about 3 billion in 1987 (constant 1977 dollars). These estimates, however, are grossly misleading; they assume no economic effects from enactment of the bill. Taking those effects into account, there would be an immediate revenue gain of $3 billion in 1978. The increase in revenues would taper off thereafter; in 1987, the net effect on Federal tax revenues would be a gain of about $1 billion.

These revenue estimates ignore the possible effects of H.R. 12111 on the extent to which taxpayers would choose to realize capital gains. The present tax treatment of capital gains not only increases the total tax on the returns to saving and investing, it also acts as a transfer tax on the disposition of capital assets. Reducing the capital gains tax rate, particularly for taxpayers with large amounts of capital assets, would in all likelihood induce an increase in the volume of realization. The data on gain realization, however, afford no basis for reliable estimation of the increase in realization in response to a reduction in the capital gains tax rate in any given period of time.

Our revenue estimates also do not take into account the effects of H.R. 12111 on capital asset values. Reducing the marginal rate of tax on capital gains should tend to raise the market value of capital assets; the magnitude of this effect is difficult to estimate. Insofar as H.R. 12111 resulted in a significant increase in realization, this would tend to curb the increase in the market value of assets. Hence, the larger the estimate of the feedback revenue gain from additional transactions, the smaller is the likely revenue gain from increases in the market valuation of assets. If one were to assume that the combined effect of additional realizations and increase in market value is a 10 percent increase in the amount of gains reported and included in taxable income, the net effect on Federal tax revenues would be an increase of about $1 billion over the amounts shown in the attached Table 1.

In any event, our estimates of the new revenue effects should be seen as lower limits. Actual revenue gains are likely to be modestly greater than shown in the attached Table 1.

CARTER ADMINISTRATION FUZZY ON GUN CONTROL

HON. JOHN M. ASHBROOK

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, press accounts this weekend have convinced me that President Carter may have given his personal endorsement to the Treasury Department proposed regulations of March 21, which provide for registration of gun sales.

By permitting confusing press accounts to be circulated over the wire services during the Memorial Day recess, the administration has convinced many that it will rescind the proposed Treasury regulations of May 22. This is not necessarily the case. It could be a ruse.

Because many of my colleagues may be confused as to the present signals. I am inserting in the RECORD two articles from the Washington Post: the first appeared May 27, 1978, and is written as follows:

GUN FRIENDS SHOOT DOWN TREASURY NUMBERS PLAN

The Treasury Department dropped stiff new gun control proposals yesterday under pressure from thousands who believed the government was trying to make them register their guns.

President Carter had proposed regulations on March 16 designed to make it easier for the government to track guns used in a crime. They would require any gun made or imported in the United States to have a unique serial number and require that all gun thefts be reported.

The problem comes over the increased reports, required from the gun manufacturers, importers and dealers.

The regulations did not have to be approved by Congress, but the Treasury's Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms Division (ATF) needed between $4 and 5 million to put the program into effect.

At least 200,000 people, led by the National Rifle Association and other pro-gun lobbying groups, put on the pressure, ATF officials said. Letters were running 18-to-1 against the proposal. Congress passed a resolution dropping $4.2 million from the ATF budget.

The Treasury gave in yesterday. "The whole business is dead," said a spokesman.

"The Treasury Department has informed Congress that the proposed firearms regulation, which is the subject of some controversy, will not be implemented unless Congress provides the funds beforehand."

When the rules were announced, Assistant Treasury Secretary Richard Davis said they would "allow us to trace firearms used in crime in a much more efficient and effective manner."

Opponents felt this was a first step toward gun registration—a highly emotional issue. The file would be computerized, they said, and a future administration could easily add the requirement that gun owners' names be added.

As one opposing letter said, "History has proven that gun registration is generally followed by gun confiscation and the enslavement of free people."

The other article which I am inserting appeared the very next day, Sunday, May 28, 1978, and reads as follows:

TREASURY DENIES IT HAS DROPPED PLANS FOR GUN-CONTROL RULES

(By Harold J. Logan)

The Treasury Department yesterday denied that it has dropped a set of proposed new gun-control regulations, but conceded it is not likely they will be implemented in 1979 as originally proposed.

The department's statement came after news reports indicated that it had dropped the proposals in the face of pressure generated by the National Rifle Association, a powerful pro-gun lobby.

The regulations would require quarterly reports of all gun sales, unique 14-character serial numbers on each gun and immediate reports of thefts from dealers.

"The Treasury Department has not withdrawn or revised the proposed regulations it published on March 21," Assistant Treasury Secretary Richard J. Davis said yesterday.

"Because of great public interest in the issue, and because of the widespread incorrect information about the nature of these proposals that have been generated by some groups we have extended the comment on them until June 30," he said.

President Carter proposed the new regulations March 16 in an effort to make it easier for the government to track guns used in crimes.

At least 200,000 people wrote to Treasury's Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms protesting the proposals. Almost immediately, Congress passed a resolution dropping $4.2 million—the amount needed to implement the regulations—from ATF's fiscal 1979 budget.

In a May 23 letter to Sen. Lawton Chiles (D-Fla.), chairman of the Treasury appropriations subcommittee, Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Carswell wrote, "If a decision is made to implement any of [these regulations], it would be necessary to seek either a supplemental appropriation for 1979 or include a request for such funds in our 1980 submission.

"We will not implement these proposals without receiving from Congress the funds to do so."

NRA officials had raised the objection that the regulations were an attempt to "end run" Congress with administrative rules that exceeded Treasury's legal authority.

I should like to emphasize for my colleagues that the first news item was a United Press International dispatch, which may likely have carried in many newspapers throughout the country. The second "clean-up" article was written by a Washington Post staff writer, and carried no UPI dispatch identification. Because some constituents may honestly believe that the Treasury Department has dropped its proposals, I believe it incumbent upon those of us in the Congress to inform the public of the following facts:

First. The Treasury Department has extended public comment until June 30, but states, as a reason that "because of great public interest in the issue, and because of the widespread incorrect information about the nature of these proposals * * *" the period for public comment is being extended. Clearly, this is a case of the tail wagging the dog. Because a Treasury Department official believes that opponents of the regulations are incorrectly informed, we can only assume that he is hoping that by leaving the doors open for public comment beyond the May 22 original deadline, many gun control groups will rally to the support of the officials who proposed the regulations.

Second. While developments in the House and Senate Appropriations Committees give us heart that the data bank system will not be implemented during fiscal year 1979, there is no assurance that the BATF will not continue to implement the structure. The agency may not fully promulgate the regulations until it receives full funding from the Appropriations Committees. During hearings in the House and Senate, the BATF was severely reprimanded for not having sought advanced authority. There are some Members, however, who, while agreeing with the regulations in principle, voted to strike down funding at this time because the Treasury Department had failed to consult the proper committees. This means that the Department could quietly incorporate the data collection system in future budgetary requests, at such a time when the public sentiment would not be running at such a high level as today.

Third. The Department has clearly stated that they have not withdrawn or revised the regulations, and have shown no inclination to do so.

Fourth. More than 200 of our colleagues in the House and the Senate have joined Senator JAMES MCCLURE and me in pursuing our legislative efforts to gain disapproval of the registration plan.

Fifth. The BATF regulations have been endorsed by the National Coalition to Ban Handguns as so valuable that "if adopted, they could represent the most important victory for handgun control since the 1968 act."

Sixth. The Treasury Department itself has stated that it has a 90 percent effectiveness on tracing firearms. No need for the regulations has been demonstrated.

FULL DISCLOSURE OF CONTENTS OF GUN REGULATIONS IS NEEDED

As ranking minority member of the committee charged with oversight of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, I have insisted upon full disclosure of the nature of this proposed rulemaking since the first day I knew of the plan. At our subcommittee briefing of March 16, the BATF first advised us of their intentions. After studying the proposal, I issued a statement that "A broad sweeping plan for gun control is being pushed by a Federal agency without the consent of Congress. This sneak attack is the Carter administration's way of getting gun control without public knowledge."

Since that statement was carried by the news media, the BATF has carried on an aggressive lobbying effort to discredit the opinions of Members of Congress who have determined to stop the implementation of these proposals.

Because many gun owners and other freedom-loving people from across the country have asked whether the BATF actually intends to pursue their rulemaking, I submit the following information for the benefit of my colleagues and interested citizens. The report contains a listing of contradictions which show, at a minimum, that the Agency has misrepresented the nature of its proposals.

CONTRADICTIONS BY THE BATF REVEALED IN SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIME OVERSIGHT HEARINGS—MAY 4, 1978, AND MAY 18, 1978

First. The BATF stated, during congressional briefings, that the cost of implementation of this project would be $4–$6 million. However, a document published by that Agency April 1, 1977, entitled "Critique by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, U.S. Treasury Department, of the Police Foundation Report on Firearms", stated that "it would take 4,432 positions and would cost $104 million." If we are to believe BATF's report of April 1, the cost of implementing this project would be astronomical.

Second. The BATF did not disclose their intentions to create a Federal firearms data bank to the Appropriations Committees, even though they had completed their drafts prior to their own appearances before the committees for fiscal year 1979 appropriations. A belated letter of May 23 to the chairman of the Senate subcommittee with appropriations authority over BATF was cited in the Washington Post article of May 28 as follows:

> If a decision is made to implement any of [these regulations], it would be necessary to seek either a supplemental appropriation for 1979 or include a request for such funds in our 1980 submission.
> We will not implement these proposals without receiving from Congress the funds to do so.

During our hearings, when confronted with a "90-percent tracing success" press release of April 1, 1978, BATF. Director Rex Davis disclaimed the accuracy of that figure, and claimed the need for improved firearms tracing capability.

The latter, taken in tandem with other erroneous press announcements, casts serious doubt upon the BATF's credibility by stating one thing to the media, and another to the Congress, they have succeeded in creating an atmosphere of doubt and mistrust.

Third. They stated during briefings and oversight hearings that they had the authority to implement these regulations. Yet, they now promise to return to us for authority to spend the funds to implement their plan. Just what has the BATF said? Do they intend to rescind the regulations, or do they intend to put them on the books? Put them on the books and wait for funding?

Fourth. The agency has stated, in correspondence with congressional offices, that the regulations would not amount to registration of individual gun owners. However, the regulations on their face will permit massive cataloging of names and addresses of citizens who purchase firearms as follows:

From a firearms licensee who goes out of business (23,000 yearly);

Purchases of more than one handgun in a period of 5 days from the same firearms licensee;

Military personnel who desire to purchase firearms while on duty for later return to the United States, and Firearms that are imported by a firearms licensee.

There is a likelihood that a "political agreement" made by certain Treasury Department officials (as revealed by Assistant Secretary Richard Davis during a March 16 briefing session), may well call for later total inclusion of the identity of all purchasers of firearms.

HEARINGS REVEAL BREACH OF FAITH BY CARTER ADMINISTRATION

During our committee hearings on the 1968 Gun Control Act, and subsequently on the proposed Federal Firearms Act of 1976, administration spokesmen said that centralized records would not be maintained under the then existing legal authority of BATF. The law has not changed, but the administration has.

Our hearings revealed that people are concerned that their Government can, in 1978, reverse commitments made in 1967 and 1975. To paraphrase the words of one of our subcommittee witnesses of May 18, Mr. Robert Cherry, a director of the National Sporting Goods Association, the public has a right to some consistency in Government policy. He said, in part:

> Now, to me when a current government official—say, Mr. Davis, Rex Davis—who is currently—or Mr. Richard Davis, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury and Mr. Davis who is the Director of the BATF—when either of those gentlemen give me an assurance or tell me something, it is more than Mr. Davis speaking to me. It is the voice of my government. And when my government assures me that something will not be done or will be done, I take that as a very definite obligation from my own government. I then, therefore, believe that it certainly should be binding because I have been assured as all of the gentlemen who are in my position in the past many times that this is not an attempt at registration, that it is something that we do not intend to do. And yet at some later date some different gentleman tells me that, "Well, we've changed our minds. We think we are going the other way." I regard that a breach of faith by my government.

I believe this sums up the feeling of those of us who are puzzled by the Carter administration's conflicting pronouncements. As Members of Congress, we, too, expect to be told the truth. We deserve to know exactly the nature of this administration's plans for gun control. Will they rescind the regulations or will they quietly implement them as they quietly work their way through the Halls of Congress? If we do not demonstrate to the people in this country that we will "hang tight" to protect them against the arrogance of Government run afoul of previous pronouncements and previous congressional limitations, I fear that we are not fulfilling our duties to serve as the closest link between the people and the Government.

WHAT CAN A MEMBER OF CONGRESS DO?

I should like to urge my colleagues who believe that the history is clear . . . that Congress has spoken loudly against Federal registration on at least 16 previous occasions, in both Houses and in the committees of the Houses, to join me in my efforts in the battle against the implementation of these regulations. I am asking our friends to redouble their efforts, and for those who have not yet joined us to do so. You may aid by doing the following:

First. Write to the BATF, expressing your concern with the implementation of such regulations. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 13, 1978, page 10138 contains many of my criticisms of the proposed regulations. The deadline for public comment has been extended to June 30. The agency, in counting responses to the proposal, has cataloged letters in separate categories, listing congressional comments separately from the other nine categories.

Second. Speak with Members of Congress who have not yet joined in cosponsoring House Concurrent Resolution 558 and Senate Concurrent Resolution 79. These resolutions serve to place BATF on notice of congressional disapproval. They reiterate the legislative history, and set forth the clear and concise argument that the attempts to implement these regulations exceed statutory authority.

Third. Plan public meeings in your congressional districts to inform constituents as to the present status of these regulations, advising of the danger of silence. In not opposing the regulations, they may permit this agency to reject the tremendous responses already received. The agency may very well attempt to implement its plans at a later time when it can quietly obtain congressional funding. The threat of this cannot be overemphasized, as the agency views persons who dissent from their own position as having "widespread incorrect information . . ." (May 28, Washington Post article).

PRESIDENT CARTER MUST CLARIFY HIS POSITION

This proposal has come home to roost on the doorstep of the President. Some press accounts would lead citizens, and perhaps Members of the National Legislature to believe that the administration has rescinded its gun control proposal.

By permitting the Federal bureaucracy to cloud public thinking as to the exact course of these regulations, the administration is casting serious doubt as to its integrity.

The President should immediately inform the public as to the plan to either implement this new system of Federal gun control, or rescind the proposal. The American public has the right to know this answer. People are deluging the Congress, asking whether their Government is going to continue its plans, rejecting prior congressional intent, or withdrawing the regulations.

Vague and inaccurate press accounts only lead to misunderstanding and, ultimately, a general lack of confidence in the functioning of Government. Who is governing whom, and by whose will are we being controlled, Mr. Carter?

I am hopeful that the developments of late will not lull us into complacency, but rather, will underscore the dire urgency of prompt and decisive action.●

AUDIT IS STILL AWAITED

HON. WILLIAM L. DICKINSON

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert into the RECORD the following news account by Jerry Landauer staff reporter of the Wall Street Journal. I believe the story speaks for itself—but will there be answers?

AUDIT IS STILL AWAITED OF CARTER'S OUTLAYS IN THE 1976 CAMPAIGN

WASHINGTON.—Jimmy Carter and Gerald Ford didn't have to knock on the doors of rich people, hat in hand, while jousting for the presidency in 1976. For the first time, taxpayers picked up all the campaign expenses.

In theory, the Carter-Ford contest marked a turning point toward cleaner government: For the victor there are no hefty donors to reward and for the loser no heavy debts to retire. But the returns on taxpayer-financed presidential politics still aren't all in.

More than a year after Mr. Carter moved into the White House, the six-member Federal Election Commission hasn't issued an audit, as required by law, of how he spent the $21.8 million in tax funds to get there. In fact, the commission hasn't even finished auditing Mr. Carter's primary campaigns, which two years ago launched him on his path to the presidency. (The primaries, too, were partly financed by tax dollars for the first time in 1976.)

The delay is noteworthy because the commission's actions will set a precedent for how closely it intends to scrutinize the details of a President's campaign, especially when some of those details may be embarrassing to the White House.

Carter campaign officials say they have met all requirements of the law. Still, a look at spending reports that the Carter campaign filed with the commission raises certain questions.

THE ULTIMATE RECIPIENT

For one thing, the Carter campaign often listed large expenditures to campaign workers—$10,000 to John Billet in New Jersey, for instance—so that the ultimate recipients aren't identified. According to commission regulations, campaign treasurers are supposed to report the "particulars" of all expenditures exceeding $100, giving the public a "sufficiently detailed description as to establish their relationship to the campaign."

Whether Mr. Carter's reports always met this detailed disclosure standard seems questionable. All told, his campaign spent nearly $500,000 for otherwise unspecified "get-out-the-vote" activities to beat Mr. Ford. Another $279,000 went for "miscellaneous office expenses." And $603,000 more isn't described in any way on the ground that all was spent in sums of less than $100; in contrast, Mr. Ford's campaign reported unitemized expenditures of $90,000.

So far, though, the commission hasn't acted even in what seem to be clear cases of inadequate compliance with the election laws. In October 1976, Mr. Carter's managers placed $338,000 in federal funds in Trust Co. Bank in Atlanta. The sole stated purpose: to "get out the vote." In April the Carter people finally filed an amended report, not in response to demands for proper disclosure by the election commission but after requests for clarification by this newspaper. The bulk of the $338,000 assertedly was spent in sums of less than $100; thus, most recipients haven't been disclosed.

APPARENT ERRORS AND DISCREPANCIES

The Carter reports also contain numerous apparent errors and discrepancies.

One involves a listed expenditure of $10,703.54 to a subsidiary of Ruder & Finn Inc. in New York. Chairman David Finn says his firm billed the Carter campaign $703.54 for designing some brochures. What happened to the other $10,000 remains a mystery. "We have absolutely no record of billing or receiving that ten thousand," Mr. Finn says, after checking twice.

In Cleveland, an officer of Hexter & Associates Inc. sounds similarly mystified by Carter statements showing that the campaign paid the company $1,700 for polling, $2,345 for telephone canvassing and $9,365 for miscellaneous office expenses. President John Hexter says his firm didn't poll anybody, didn't canvass voters and incurred just $60 in expenses in connection with various printing jobs.

John E. Mathews Jr. of Jacksonville, Fla., is listed as the recipient of $2,000 from the Carter campaign; Mr. Mathews says he merely cashed a check, as a favor for the local Carter coordinator.

Besides, should taxpayers pick up the tab for $395.70 paid by the Carter campaign to the Utah State Liquor Commission just before Election Day? Or for the $1,000 paid to the Shrine of the Black Madonna in Detroit to help turn out black votes? Or for $1,000 paid to Gino's Restaurant in Manhattan plus $301.51 to Bird of Paradise Liquors in Albuquerque for "miscellaneous office expenses"? Or for $1,575 sent to Jimenz Food Products Inc. in San Antonio for "vote getting and other"?

Spokesmen for the Carter campaign committee sound confident that violations didn't occur. "Our committee has made every effort to comply fully with all requirements of the federal election laws," says Douglas Huron, now senior associate counsel at the White House. The Carter spending reports on file with the commission may contain some unintentional omissions, Mr. Huron says, "but all our expenditures are fully documented in our internal files."

At the election commission, a spokesman says the $50,000-a-year commissioners (three Republicans and three Democrats, including three former Congressmen) are working hard. The agency has finished auditing 10 of the 15 contenders in the presidential primaries. And in April the agency finally published an audit of Mr. Ford's general election campaign. Except for $700 to pay parking tickets, the former President's government grants were all spent for "qualified"—that is, legitimate—political purposes, the audit found; Mr. Ford's people refunded the $700.

By contrast, a tough-minded audit of the Carter campaign could retrieve many thousands of dollars for the Treasury because Mr. Carter's managers evidently can't produce receipts for all the "walking around money" sent to ward politicians in certain cities to turn out a big Democratic vote; an outlay that can't be documented, including those for less than $100, must be refunded.

Still another sticky issue is candidate Carter's free use of an airplane owned by National Bank of Georgia in the spring of 1976. This favor could be deemed an illegal corporate contribution because the Carter people didn't pay for four campaign flights on the bank's plane until the summer of 1977; that's when the facts became known during the investigation of the President's friend and then Budget Director, Bert Lance, who had headed the bank. White House aides worry that the press would pounce on an unfavorable finding to belabor the President again.

The election commission also has been slow to act on questionable outlays involving some other candidates. The commission hasn't yet moved to investigate a possible violation more than two years ago in the financing of Democratic Sen. Henry Jackson's 1976 presidential primary campaign.

Under the law, no political committee can give a candidate for federal office more than $5,000; any further spending on his behalf must be "independent"—that is, without the candidate's cooperation and certainly not at his request. In early 1976 the political arm of the Marine Engineers Beneficial Association gave Mr. Jackson's campaign $5,000. Then on the same day in April 1976, the Marine Engineers gave $5,000 to each of five political clubs in Baltimore.

One of the Baltimore clubs, the Fourth District Democratic Organization, reported the income as coming not from the Marine Engineers but from Sen. Jackson himself—a clear indication that this $5,000 and perhaps the $20,000 to the four other clubs weren't spent independently, as the law requires.

At times, however, the election commission moves fast. On Dec. 30, 1977, the Democratic National Committee asked for a waiver of existing legal limits on political contributions so that the Democrats could deploy the fund-raising prowess of the presidency one more time, to wipe out old party debts totaling $2 million.

It took the commission just a couple of days to process the necessary paper work. Then, without taking time to publicize the request in its official publication so that outsiders could object the commission unanimously yielded to the Democratic desire early in 1978.

ARE THE PRESIDENT'S HANDS TIED IN AFRICA?

HON. CHARLES E. GRASSLEY

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. Speaker, we will be considering the Export-Import Bank reauthorization bill shortly. This bill is of major importance to U.S. exporters, to U.S. workers, and finally, to all the rest of us who suffer from the inflationary effects of a severe balance of payments deficit.

However, within this bill are amendments which are addressed more to this Nation's foreign policy than to our economic predicament. Like many members on the Banking Committee, and in the rest of Congress, I continue to have reservations about the inconsistencies which characterize this Nation's foreign policy with regard to countries which violate internationally recognized human rights.

For some time I have believed that the United States should champion the cause of human rights, and that the best way to do so is by our own good example. What this means is that we should show ourselves to be supporters of those countries whose policies allow citizens fundamental democratic rights and freedoms. Governments can lean left or right, but as far as I am concerned, when they move against the liberties of their citizens they are in the wrong.

Our foreign policy is determined for the most part by the President, and this is how it should be, for such a system prevents special parochial interests to interfere with the consistency and the administration of that policy. Congress has stood as watchdog of the President, intervening when it feels that the President has erred. Yet I have reached the conclusion that the executive and legislative branches of this Government are beginning to work at cross purposes, and the confusion of our foreign policy, probably as much the cause as the effect of the current congressional involvement in foreign policy affairs, is mounting to dangerous proportions. The ongoing turbulance in Africa and our role there serves as an explicit and eye-opening case in point.

The present danger and our exposure in Africa is a subject which too few Americans fully appreciate in that they do not see the relationship between Africa and the rest of the world in a large enough perspective. A close examination of the crisis in Africa can tell us a great deal about a crisis that may be developing here.

The current tussle over whether or not the President's hands are tied in Africa is a legitimate one. In this post Vietnam/post Watergate time, the United States is quite obviously going through a period of adjustment and readjustment over who has what authority. The country has gone through similar periods of adjustment in the past—the post Civil War era, and the period following the stock market crash of 1929 are two examples that come to mind.

In the election of 1976, we saw the electorate select a President based, not on what he knew or on what experience he had, but on how honest he appeared and how he said what he said. The primary issue in that election was as much the integrity of the Nation and its institutions as it was anything else . . . and what has resulted might well have been expected. A President with little experience in national or world affairs has illustrated to the world a foreign policy that at best can be described as inconsistent, and at worst may be exceedingly dangerous . . . and a Congress, bent on preventing abuses of executive power, has legislated its way into the foreign affairs arena to a point that may be equally dangerous.

Are the President's hands tied in Africa? Yes—to a degree they are; just as they potentially could be in half a dozen other global hot spots.

Given two facts of life—that the primary concern of "foreign policy" is strategic; that is, the security of the Nation in the face of other nations' competing interests, and that the primary concern of "domestic policy" is the welfare of the citizenry—and recognizing that the two are not always so easily defined, then a constant balance must be sought between interpretation of domestic policy and strategic concerns. Nowhere is that argument more self-evident than in the current debate over human rights policies. The most effective device at our disposal, in that area, is to provide the very best example here at home. We cannot, through any method short of invasion, enforce such a policy within the borders of other nations. It is true that we can effect the internal policies of those nations we do business with, within limits—as the House Banking Committee intended to do when we agreed to prohibit Export-Import Bank dealings in South Africa. That action, while directly affecting an extremely small percentage of the South African economy, would carry the message to that country's government that we do not condone their apartheid policies.

At this point it should be clear, even to a young and in some respects naive administration, that the entire continent of Africa is of immense strategic importance. And it should be clear to the Congress that legislation which prevents the President—any President—from having the flexibility to respond rapidly to foreign policy developments, within logical limits, is strategically dangerous. If Angola, 2 years ago, and Ethiopia, more recently, did not impress upon us the extent of the Soviet-Cuban threat on that continent, then surely the most recent bloody incursion into Zaire by Angolan rebels should have.

Just as domestic policy and strategic needs must constantly be balanced, so must the relative power of the Presidency and the oversight role of Congress be constantly balanced. An out-of-control Presidency, overawed with its military and diplomatic powers, has to be guarded against—recent history has shown that. But so must a tendency of the Congress to arbitrarily inject legislation that interferes with the constitutional role of the Presidency. Both needs can be protected while still allowing the President to respond rapidly to calls for help from our strategically important friends. The role of the Congress in such situations must be to keep the President honest—to question him, and his motives, at every opportunity—and perhaps to limit the type or extent of assistance it is his to give. But the role of Congress must not be to "tie the President's hands" by injecting the ponderous legislative process into every foreign policy decision.●

WILLIAM SAFIRE ON THE "NEW POOR" IN AMERICA

HON. JACK F. KEMP
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, the nationally syndicated columnist, William Safire, had a commentary in this morning's New York Times which not only merits the attention of every Member of Congress but, by the severity of what it says, also demands this Congress address itself to the issues raised. I refer to the unconscionably high rate of inflation and tax rates on the backs of American workers and savers and the refusal of the administration to deal with it by even admitting its true cause.

There is an ill-wind blowing from the economic policymaking circles of the administration on how it probably intends to deal with inflation. And that ill-wind sounds and feels like the rhetoric voiced and the subsequent programs put into place by the Nixon administration in 1971 and 1972. That administration started by jawboning, which is what the present administration is doing. Then it proceeded to voluntary wage and price controls, which is what the present administration is talking about. Then it slapped on mandatory wage and price controls. That led to an inevitable slowing of the economy, brought on by the worst shortages in peacetime history and by confusion and lack of confidence among producers and consumers, and that then led to the worst recession since the Great Depression and chronic unemployment.

Has this administration learned nothing?

What, then, is the answer?

The prescription offered by Mr. Safire for the Federal Government ending the prospects of double-digit inflation are a cut in nondefense spending and a tightening of the money supply. Both are certainly the right steps. But the only real way we can tighten the money supply is to restore incentive to the economy for work and production by a dramatic and permanent tax rate reduction. Aggregate savings would rise by more than enough to cover the short-term deficit, and because of those savings and greater after-tax income, the Federal Reserve would not have to buy any additional Treasury bills, thereby increasing the money supply. That is how I believe Mr. Safire's proposal would work to stop this assault on the people of America.

Mr. Speaker, in order to do what Mr. Safire proposes, this country must have permanent tax rate reductions. It is the only effective way to get us off the horns of the inflation vs. unemployment dilemma, for the economic growth which would flow from such reductions would both reduce the rate of inflation and the rate of unemployment, thus allowing real income growth to combat the problem of the new poor.

Mr. Safire's column follows:

THE NEW POOR

(By William Safire)

WASHINGTON.—If you are making more money now than you ever made before, but inflation and the "tax bracket creep" have reduced the purchasing power of your take-home pay, then you are a member of The New Poor.

If you used your life savings to buy a home, and rising property taxes are forcing you to sell and move to a neighborhood where houses are cheaper, you are a member of The New Poor.

The growing resentment of The New Poor will make itself felt next week in a taxpayers' revolt in California; a chain reaction is likely to follow in other states, as voters turn on their bureaucratic tormentors.

The source of this resentment is a combination of furies. Not only do The New Poor believe that Government programs have become too bloated and expensive, they also believe that Government policy is directed against their interests. Carternomics stimulates the economy to reduce unemployment and help the "old" poor, while it causes runaway inflation that creates legions of the new poor.

The Consumer Price Index released today, showing a 10.8 percent yearly rate of inflation, will be explained away as temporary, caused by flukes or greedy capitalists or bad weather. But double-digit inflation (a phrase coined in March 1974 by Times economic writer Leonard Silk) is wiggling its victory sign, and the Administration in power cannot pass the buck.

Although Government statisticians claim that the cost of living has risen by only 28 percent in the past four years—an average of 7 percent a year—they are living in an unreal world. Raymond DeVoe, Jr. of Loeb Rhoades Hornblower has compiled a half-facetious "trivia index" that shows what has been going on beyond the price of hamburger:

Since 1974, the cost of a can of Coca-Cola has doubled, from 20 cents to 40 cents; in that time, a milkshake at McDonald's has risen 47 percent; Band-Aids are up 75 percent, dog biscuits up 67 percent. Laundering a shirt cost 50 cents then, 91 cents now: a Beefeater Martini that cost $1.75 then is $3.00 now, and a dime's stay at a parking meter is now a quarter. (Panhandlers now ask for a quarter instead of a dime, a 150 percent increase.)

The price of Time, Newsweek, Playboy, TV Guide and The New York Daily News has gone up 100 percent since 1974, as has a stein of beer in a singles bar and a packet of Kleenex in which to cry. (The New York Times has risen 33 percent, but now offers new sections and a conservative columnist.) New rubber heels cost twice as much, as do basketball tickets, and a check bounced by your bank now costs $5.00 instead of $3.00. (The salary of the chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers has risen 35 percent in two years.)

The point is that the "real" cost of living—including all those non-necessities that we cannot do without—has risen at a rate twice that of the official inflation rate. And not because of the weather, or corporate greed; the reason is that public policy demands stimulation to reduce unemployment.

How do we stop double-digit inflation and the creation of tens of millions of new poor? At the local level, as in California, force the reduction of the bureaucracy and accept fewer services; at the Federal level, cut non-defense spending and tighten money to put the brakes on the rise in the cost of living.

But Mr. Carter has not the stomach for this. When he replaces his token woman in-house liberal, Midge Costanza, he keeps her on the bloated White House payroll; to make way for her successor's staff, he puts the unneeded Costanza crew on the Labor Department payroll for over $100,000 a year. When the latest save-the-cities boondoggle was announced, it included a budget to employ the President's son at $26,000 a year; to offset this sort of petty patronage graft, Mr. Carter's budget calls for 495 fewer F.B.I. agents.

Instead of attacking Government-caused inflation, Mr. Carter seems destined to take the Nixon route: he will exhort for a while, perhaps add his own antibusiness finger-wagging, and then—in the third year of his Presidency—impose wage and price controls, which will be popular and make him seem activist.

The controls may come in the form of the Wallich-Okun scheme, using the tax system to subsidize "reasonable" price and wage increases. This is wage-price control in sheep's clothing, and might hold down the lid until the 1980 elections, after which organized labor would blow it sky-high.

To deflect the resentments of The New Poor, Mr. Carter will jawbone at selected villains until failure is apparent, and then will treat only the symptoms of inflation with disguised or direct controls.

That's a sad scenario. If the Carter men had the courage to apply the brakes now—and thereby gain the productivity increases that a mild recession brings—we would be able to avoid a crippling inflation this year, a loss of economic freedom next year, and a major recession after that.●

FBI INDICTMENTS

HON. LEO C. ZEFERETTI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. ZEFERETTI. Mr. Speaker, on May 10, Senator HAYAKAWA and I introduced a concurrent resolution calling for the dismissal of the indictments against three high-ranking officials of the FBI: former Acting Director L. Patrick Gray, former Acting Associate Director W. Mark Felt, and former Assistant Director Edward S. Miller.

I would like to commend to my colleagues' attention two very recent and timely articles on this subject—one that appeared in the New York Times by William Safire and another by Kevin Lynch and Richard Brookhiser which appeared in the National Review. These articles deserve serious reading.

The articles follow:

[From the New York Times, May 18, 1978]

RUNNING AGAINST HOOVER

(By William Safire)

WASHINGTON, May 17.—The ill-considered decision of the Carter Administration to prosecute former F.B.I. officials, and to discipline present F.B.I. agents, for using questionable but long-tolerated investigative techniques in order to stop the terrorist bombers of the Weather Underground, has begun to backfire.

The accused lawmen and threatened agents have refused to cop the plea offered them; they will not plead to a misdemeanor and take a suspended sentence. On principle, they say they operated within then-recognized guidelines in upholding public safety, and that current operations of the Justice Department are not that much different today.

What worries Justice most is the accused officials' right to "discovery"—finding out about past and current practices similar to those they are accused of—which would then be taken before a jury in open court.

For nearly a year, people inside and outside Justice have been nervous about "cooperating with the law," when such cooperation may later be deemed illegal.

For example, after Vice President Mondale made a speech in August of 1977 supporting a bill outlawing all warrantless wiretapping, the telephone company—which does the tapping for the Government and is worried about civil damage suits arising therefrom—threatened to refuse to do any foreign intelligence work without a court order.

On Sept. 29, 1977, Attorney General Griffin Bell wrote American Telephone and Telegraph "to assure you that it remains the position of the Executive Branch that the foreign intelligence surveillances . . . are a lawful exercise of the President's constitutional power."

Nervousness about being sued or prosecuted tomorrow for what the A.G. says is legal today extends to agents on the beat. The longest floating investigation in existence is the F.B.I.'s surveillance of the Communist Party of the U.S.A., begun in 1938. In 1976, Attorney General Levi—recognizing that the surveillance of a political party could no longer lawfully be conducted under the rubric of "domestic security"—simply switched the case's cover sheet, giving that investigation the legal rationale of a foreign intelligence probe.

"Discovery" will show that F.B.I. agents have been following certain officials of the Communist Party in the United States, looking at the outside of their mail and examining their roll calls, at the very least. (Properly, Judge Bell refuses to confirm even the existence of this particular investigation: he tells me, "I never signed a wiretap authorization on the Communist Party U.S.A." and that no surveillance is being used which, if used in a criminal case, would require a warrant. He adds obliquely, "we just keep up with people.")

Someday, however, the question will arise: Is this legal? When the Trotskyite Socialist Workers Party was the object of the F.B.I.'s "Cointelpro" surveillance only a few years ago, it rightly hollered bloody murder and the F.B.I. was denounced for police-state tactics.

If the Communist Party, U.S.A., is an agent of a foreign power, or if its leaders are engaged in conducting espionage here, Justice ought to prove its case and close the sham party down; if you cannot make a case after forty years, you're not really trying.

On the other hand, if the long-suspected, closely watched leaders of the Communist Party here are not demonstrably agents of a foreign power, then it is the "foreign intelligence" excuse for keeping them under surveillance that is the sham, and we should extend to our card-carrying friends the same protections accorded members of any other party.

One day, what the F.B.I. is now doing will be challenged. Put yourself in the shoes of the F.B.I. agent taking pictures from across the street of visitors to Communist Party headquarters; will future interpreters of the law find him guilty? Put yourself in the shoes of the Attorney General: "I cannot be certain that I won't be prosecuted someday for doing what I think is legal today."

That's not right: a person's actions should be judged in the context of the time those actions are taken, and not ex post facto. Of course, if "discovery" should turn up a memo dated only last spring directing F.B.I. agents to work in certain gray areas with the assurance that what seems illegal is really permissible counterespionage, that would be an even more vivid example of hypocrisy.

At a time when Soviet expansionism and espionage are gaining strength, Mr. Carter ought not to be looking for scapegoats to satisfy our consciences for yesterday's practices, or blowing an uncertain trumpet at today's troops. Justice should drop its politically inspired indictments before "discovery" destroys what little spycatching capacity we have left.

HUNTING DOWN THE FBI

(By Kevin Lynch and Richard Brookhiser)

In May of 1970, Miss Bernardine Dohrn, leader of the Weatherman faction of the Students for a Democratic Society, announced a shift in policy:

"Now we are adapting the classic guerrilla strategy of the Vietcong and the urban guerrilla strategy of the Tupamaros to our situation here in the most technically advanced country in the world. . . . Within the next 14 days we will attack a symbol or institution of American injustice. This is the way we celebrate the example of Eldridge Cleaver and H. Rap Brown and all black revolutionaries who first inspired us by their fight behind enemy lines for the liberation of the people."

Miss Dohrn's organization had inadvertently tipped its hand two months earlier when a nail-packed anti-personnel bomb exploded in a Greenwich Village townhouse, shredding three Weatherman manufacturers. Subsequent bombs were better built, and, over the next two years, the Weathermen—later known as the Weather Underground—claimed credit for explosions in Cambridge, Chicago, Marin County, Calif., and, in Washington, D.C., the Capitol building and the Pentagon. Thereafter, their activities fell off, though as late as 1975 they acknowledged bombings of the State Department, a New York bank, and the Kennecott Copper Building in Salt Lake City.

On April 10, 1978, a federal grand jury indicted a lawyer from Stonington, Connecticut, and two other former government employees in connection with the Weather Underground episodes. Later that day, the Justice Department dismissed related charges against an executive of Wells Fargo. What made the government's actions interesting was that the four men were not ex-bombers, but ex-members of the FBI; and they had been charged with infringing the civil rights of friends and acquaintances of the Weathermen.

The Justice Department has been pursuing the FBI angle of the Weather Underground case since the spring of 1976. The assignment to track the terrorists down had originally been given to FBI Squad 47, based in New York; in the course of its investigations, the civil rights division of the Justice Department found that Squad 47 had tapped the phones of 12 persons and opened the mail of 16. Grand juries were impaneled to investigate the Bureau, and agents of the Squad found themselves haled for questioning.

The lawyers of the Justice team were more interested in FBI higher-ups than in Squad 47, however, and so they employed the use-immunity law, by which witnesses before grand juries can be forced to testify against themselves, with the assurance that their testimony will not be used against them. The tactic worked until the investigation reached John Kearney. Kearney had been supervisor of Squad 47 from late 1970 to June 1972, and Justice offered to let him plead guilty to minor charges of civil-rights violations if he would finger his superiors. But Kearney, believing himself innocent of any wrongdoing, refused to cooperate. Justice squeezed but Kearney wouldn't budge. On April 7, 1977, he was indicted on two counts of conspiracy, two counts of obstruction of correspondence, and one count of unlawful wiretapping. The statute of limitations would have run out two months later.

The Kearney indictment—the first indictment of an agent in the Bureau's 54-year history—stirred both the FBI and the Justice Department. Former and current agents leapt to Kearney's defense, while some Justice lawyers accused Attorney General Griffin Bell of not pushing the investigation high and hard enough. The lawyers were answered on April 10, 1978, when former Acting Director L. Patrick Gray, former Chief of Counterintelligence Edward Miller, and former Acting Associate Director W. Mark Felt were indicted for conspiring to deprive citizens of their civil rigths. At the same time, Bell announced that the FBI would undertake disciplinary proceedings against 69 of its members, including J. Wallace LaPrade, head of the New York field office. In a postscript, the prosecution of Kearney was dropped.

The case against Kearney rested on two basic charges: unlawful wiretapping and unlawful mail-opening. Until 1972, the FBI, with the blessing of several Attorneys General, had routinely conducted wiretaps on domestic organizations without getting warrants. Appearing before a Senate Appropriations subcommittee a few weeks after Kearney's indictment, Attorney General Bell acknowledged that what Kearney did "has been going on for forty years in this country." In 1963, for example, no less a civil libertarian than Attorney General Robert Kennedy, when informed that an advisor to Martin Luther King Jr. was suspected of having Communist ties, suggested to J. Edgar Hoover that the FBI should begin wiretapping King. In 1972, the Supreme Court ruled that warrants were required for taps on domestic organizations, but the Court didn't require warrants if the tapped organizations had "significant" ties with a foreign power, its agents, or its agencies. Lest there be any doubt about whether the Weather Underground had such ties, the FBI his compiled a four-hundred-page report detailing its relationships with foreign powers, particularly Cuba, a frequent host to the Weather Underground ever since the group's founding in 1969.

The mail-opening charge was as securely based as the wire-tapping charge. Mail-opening, like wiretapping, had long been a routine FBI tool. In a memorandum to Attorney General Bell, Kearney's defenders noted that former Attorney General Levi, when forced to make a decision on whether to prosecute agents for opening mail, chose not to: "Whatever can be said about the law now, the Department believes at the time the potential defendants acted, there was substantial basis for thinking that the law was otherwise."

In order to avoid such confusions, the Justice Department rephrased its second batch of charges. Gray, Miller, and Felt are accused of conspiring "to injure and oppress citizens of the United States"; the indictment cites as "overt acts" break-ins at the homes of eight relatives and friends of the Weathermen. Justice's new argument was deliberately modeled on United States v. Ehrlichman, another case involving a high federal official and a break-in; and it seems tailored to outflank several defenses along the lines of those that Kearney's lawyers were planning.

The Justice Department charges, new and old, have caused unprecedented consternation in the Bureau. Agents, normally as vocal as door-jambs, are speaking out singly and en masse. When Kearney made his pleas in Manhattan a year ago, three hundred agents greeted him—the first public demonstration, the New York Daily News noted, in FBI history. On April 20 of this year nearly a thousand people, most of them agents, gathered outside the District Court in Washington, D.C. to applaud Gray, Miller, and Felt as they went to make their pleas; among them were two hundred agents who had come from New York on predawn buses.

Meanwhile, in private, individual agents have been accusing the Justice Department of vendetta—or of ambition. "There are certain lawyers in Justice," commented one, "who want to see our heads roll so they can take credit for rooting out so-called corruption in the FBI. It's a big career-builder at the expense of men who honestly thought they were acting within the law."

Against all this, the Justice Department would surely maintain that it is striving to right old wrongs. The FBI overrated in its pursuit of the Weathermen, they would say; "the risks to national security in this case," Benjamin Civiletti of the Department's Criminal Division told the Washington Post, "were ephemeral." Others, with longer memories, support the FBI. As Representative John Rousselot (R., Calif.) reminded the House.

"It would be naive to presume—in those troubled days of the early Seventies—that the Department of Justice, the Federal Government, and the investigative news media had no inkling of the extraordinary efforts and measures employed by the FBI to apprehend these threats to national security. Yet there was no public outcry during the emergency. But now, in a different era, when the challenge has been met and the nation is no longer at the mercy of this little band of bombers, an entirely new viewpoint—and an entirely new set of rules—is being applied."

The new set of rules enables the former quarry to turn on their pursuers. So far, five civil suits have been filed against Kearney, Miller, and Felt, all spawned by allegations made in the original Kearney indictment. Also named in the suits are half a dozen other present and former FBI and Justice Department personnel.

Among the first to bring suit was William A. Price, whose phone Squad 47 is alleged to have tapped and whose leftist credentials range from a 1956 appearance before the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee, where he refused to answer questions about his relationship with the Communist Party of the United States, to a 1971 trip to Cuba with a contingent of the Venceremos Brigade. The law firm handling the suit is Rabinowitz, Boudin, and Standard, and it must be deriving as much pleasure from the suit as Mr. Price. The firm is the New York counsel of the National Emergency Civil Liberties Committee, a legal arm of the CPUSA and a leader in the campaign against U.S. intelligence agencies. Leonard Boudin, whose leftist credentials are in even better order than Price's, is, in addition, the father of Kathy Boudin, a member of the Weather Underground who is still being sought by the FBI (recent speculation places her well beyond the Bureau's reach: in the Soviet Union).

Though civil suits against federal employees are not a new phenomenon, they have never been as popular as they are now. Since the civil suit is a relatively easy way to gain free publicity, many leftist organizations, in particular, are going this route. Of such suits, the one generally recognized as posing the greatest threat to U.S. intelligence services is the one brought by the Socialist Workers Party. The SWP, the major Trotskyist organ in the United States, pledged itself at its founding to the defense of the Soviet Union, and reaffirmed that commitment in 1972. From 1938, when it was first organized, until 1976, when Attorney General Levi issued guidelines that barred the FBI from further investigations of it, the SWP was under government surveillance. It learned of that surveillance through the theft, by persons still unknown, of documents from the FBI office in Media, Pennsylvania. In July 1973, shortly after that theft, the SWP filed suit against 22 members of the FBI, the CIA, the Postal Service, and the Treasury, Justice, and Defense Departments. Although the suit is still in the discovery stage, the Trotskyists have already scored several significant victories: 1) access (as a result of favorable discovery rulings by Federal District Judge Thomas Griesa) to fifty thousand FBI documents relating to the Bureau's investigation; 2) proof that the CIA collected information on SWP officials and members when they traveled abroad; 3) evidence that the civil suits were reducing FBI intelligence collection (an agent has testified that even before Levi's guidelines were issued, the Bureau had reduced its investigation of the SWP because the "agents don't want to be put in a position where they are accused of harassment"); 4) a warning by Judge Griesa that he would consider imprisoning FBI officials or other persons who defied a court order to disclose the names of informers still in place.

To gain some idea of how great the boom in civil suits against federal employees has been, one need only look at the Justice Department's annual bills for private counsel. In 1974, the Department paid $12,000 for private attorneys to represent government employees; in 1975, it paid $47,800; in 1976, it paid $554,306; and in 1977, it paid over $2 million. The cost of private counsel has risen so astronomically—the bill for the SWP suit alone is expected to reach almost $2 million—that the Department has had to request supplemental appropriations from Congress, some of whose members have been extremely recalcitrant. Speaking of one intelligence-related suit, in which the defendants range from several GIs to the Secretary of Defense, Senator Lowell Weicker told Attorney General Bell, "Brother, if you think I want to go ahead and pay any portion of their legal defense, I sure don't." Weicker informed Bell that he looked with a "very, very jaundiced eye" on requests for money to defend "unlawful" intelligence actions; such requests were based, he said, on reasoning—that the defendants were following orders—rejected "at the Nuremberg trials."

Weicker must be relieved, then, to know that the Justice Department is not bearing the costs of Kearney's defense, for which he should thank Attorney General Levi. Shortly before the end of the Ford Administration, Levi issued guidelines strictly defining the areas of federal obligation. According to the guidelines, government employees would have to bear the costs of their own defense: 1) if, as in Kearney's case, a federal indictment had been filed against them; 2) if investigation indicated such an indictment was likely; 3) if investigation revealed evidence of participation in a crime; or 4) if the employees' action did not reasonably appear to have been within the scope of their normal duties.

Although he has not chosen to amend the guidelines, Levi's successor, Griffin Bell, has expressed his dissatisfaction with them. Bell told a Senate Appropriation subcommittee that he thought it was a "great shame" that these men—Kearney and the other FBI agents who are facing civil suits—will be stripped of "their money, their life savings, to pay their lawyers when they thought they were doing something in the interest of their country." Bell was undoubtedly aware of what the threat of civil suits has done to FBI effectiveness—to say nothing for morale. "I feel I should consult a lawyer before carrying out an assignment," a New York agent said. "How can I know if my superiors are acting properly? Or, even if they are, that some lawyer in Justice isn't going to interpret something as a crime that previously was standard procedure?"

Some members of Congress have, accordingly, introduced legislation to make federal employees less vulnerable to bounty hunters. One bill, proposed by the Carter Administration, would grant federal employees immunity to civil suits by substituting the government as defendant whenever the Attorney General determines that the original target of the suit was acting within the scope of his normal duties. In the event that the government lost the case and damages were assessed against it, the employee in question would be subject to disciplinary and administrative action—or, if his actions were found to be criminal, to prosecution. The bill stipulates, however, that a "good-faith reliance on a court order or legislative authorization shall constitute a complete defense to any claim or suit arising under the Constitution." Introduced in the Senate by James Eastland and in the House by Peter Rodino—the chairmen of their respective Judiciary Committees—the bill's chances for passage are considered good.

In the meantime, the more than one hundred active and former special agents who have been summoned before grand juries to testify about the FBI's Weather Underground program have had to rely for their legal defense on the fund-raising abilities of two organizations, the Society of Former Special Agents of the FBI and the Ad Hoc Citizens' Legal Defense Fund for the FBI. The former group is 41 years old and, until the plague of litigation hit, functioned mainly as a charitable and benevolent organization; it also undertook, since active FBI agents are by law forbidden from Capitol Hill, to present the FBI viewpoint there. But at present, most of the Society's energies are consumed in raising funds ($300,000 so far) to defend the accused agents. The other organization, the Citizens' Legal Defense Fund, is much younger (founded in May of last year) and owes its existence solely to the character of John Kearney. By April 8, the day after his indictment, one of his colleagues at Wells Fargo (where he had gone to work after he retired from the FBI), James Brustman, had already launched a campaign to defend him. Out of Brustman's efforts evolved the Citizens' Legal Defense Fund.

Headed by Clare Boothe Luce, James Buckley, and William Simon, the Legal Defense Fund has most certainly struck a chord; it has been deluged by letters expressing a heartfelt bitterness toward the Weather Underground—and toward the U.S. Government for prosecuting a loyal employee. So far, about fifteen thousand people have made donations including Barry Goldwater, Leon Jaworski, and a retiree who, along with his donation, offered to take Kearney's place in jail. Enough money came in to enlist the services of Edward Bennett Williams, the noted trial attorney, on Kearney's behalf.

Since the Legal Defense Fund was also providing money for the other agents who had been summoned before grand juries in New York and Washington, its resources, like those of the Society of Former Special Agents, were strained. Now, with the indictments of Gray, Miller, and Felt, they will be strained even further. More money, in larger donations, would undoubtedly come in if contributions were tax-exempt, but the Internal Revenue Service has denied the Defense Fund's request for status as a tax-exempt organization. That decision is being appealed on several grounds—perhaps the most interesting being that, while the IRS has denied the Legal Defense Fund tax-exempt status, it has seen fit to grant it to Mr. Boudin's National Emergency Civil Liberties Committee, which is supporting one of the civil suits against Kearney.

Even more important than the injury to individual agents is what litigation does to FBI effectiveness, as demonstrated in the SWP suit. An intelligence organization that is unable to protect its sources gets very little intelligence; if Judge Griesa's decision to compel the Justice Department to disclose the names of the FBI informants inside the SWP is upheld by higher courts, the FBI will be dealt a paralyzing blow. Even without the help of Judge Griesa, the FBI, like the CIA, is already getting much less intelligence than it did just a few years ago.

Stuart Knight, director of the Secret Service, has testified before the Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures that his organization is only receiving about 40 to 50 per cent of the intelligence information it received two years ago, primarily because of the Freedom of Information Act and the Privacy Act. The FOIA, which was widely greeted as a legislative watershed, gives individuals and organizations the right to obtain information about themselves in the possession of government agencies. The Privacy Act prevents the Federal Government from releasing information about anyone without his consent. Knight said that—as a consequence of these laws—he has been forced to recommend that President Carter not visit certain cities because of the erosion of police intelligence on radicals and terrorists in those cities. The police in most cities now routinely withhold intelligence information from the FBI and the CIA out of fear that the agencies will be forced to disclose the information under the FOIA. Meanwhile, because of the Privacy Act, the FBI no longer provides police and other local law-enforcement agencies with the information it once did.

As the intelligence agencies weaken, the morale of their organized opponents rises. In January of last year the National Lawyers Guild convened a meeting to address the "need for unified action around the country to stop political spying." Out of this meeting, the Campaign to Stop Government Spying was born. Headed by Morton Halperin, the CSGS is an umbrella group composed of 45 member organizations and 33 "cooperating organizations." Its membership ranges from soigné organizations like the Americans for Democratic Action and the Friends of the Earth to groups that, in a bygone era, were referred to as Communist fronts—the National Lawyers Guild and the National Emergency Civil Liberties Committee. The CSGS sees no need for subterfuge. Recognizing that the intelligence agencies have been stunned by the law suits, by the various state and federal laws sharply restricting intelligence gathering, and by the increasing pressure from a generally hostile media, it hopes to close in for the kill—to terminate all intelligence surveillance. To this end it is on record as favoring legislation that confines the FBI solely to criminal investigations of persons reasonably suspected of having committed a federal crime.

Meanwhile, although the Carter Administration hasn't yet issued its promised regulations for the CIA and the FBI, Vice President Mondale has gone on record as stating that the guidelines would prohibit the FBI from investigating political organizations in the name of "domestic security." Mondale also promised that the Senate and House Intelligence Committees would receive "the full facts about intelligence programs, including timely notice of all covert operations."

Curiously, while the U.S. intelligence agencies have an abundance of overseers, on Capitol Hill and in the rest of the country, the activities of other intelligence services go largely unmarked. The Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, for example, devoted the bulk of its first annual report to the activities of the CIA and the FBI; it also briefly discussed the operations in the U.S. of the Chilean, Iranian, Taiwanese, and Filipino intelligence services. The report failed to mention, however, the Soviet bloc's intelligence operations in the U.S., compared to which the efforts of Chile et al. are strictly Little League. Last year, Soviet agents were expelled from Norway, Sweden, West Germany, Switzerland, Spain, and Zambia. At the same time, the FBI arrested: a Soviet émigré in New Jersey, on charges of attempting to transmit space program secrets to a KGB agent; two Americans in California, on charges of plotting with a Soviet official in Mexico; and an American and a West German in Florida, on charges of conspiring to smuggle cruise missile components to the USSR.

Since there are reliably reported to be at least one thousand full-time Soviet-bloc spies in the U.S., it is probably safe to assume that a major share of their activities are proceeding free of interference. An aide to a Republican senator recently said he takes it for granted that there is a Soviet presence on Capitol Hill. Given the fact that spies have been discovered inside virtually every major Western government, he says it is naive to think that they wouldn't make a special effort to penetrate the government of their major adversary—and that they couldn't succeed, especially when the adversary is preoccupied with the fumigation of its own intelligence agencies.

Dangerous in a different way, though equally unnoticed these days, are the anomic madmen of the terrorist underworld. The relation of international terrorism to the Soviet bloc is complicated. Many terrorists get arms or training from Communist countries: Weathermen and Black Panthers used to travel to Cuba; Italy's Red Brigades carry guns from Czechoslovakia. It is difficult, however, to call the terrorists Communists in any meaningful sense. The FALN, the Baader-Meinhof gang, the Japanese Red Army group, have no programs, no coherent ideas, no motives, seemingly, beyond boredom and a kind of fierce pettiness. This is irrelevant to their foreign patrons. Terrorists turn to "Communism" for a semblance of intellectual coherence, and to Communists for infusions of supplies and expertise; Communists, for their part, are quite willing to support terrorists, in order to depress the public spirit of enemy nations. By sapping the FBI, the United States sets itself up as an inviting target. "The real question today," observed J. Wallace LaPrade, "is what we are saying to members of terrorist groups in this country and throughout the world."

Judging from its behavior, Washington seems to find LaPrade's observation irrelevant—as irrelevant, in its own way, as Bernardine Dohrn's outdated ravings. May Washington reconsider the warning, before America is forced to reconsider the threat.●

FLAG DAY

Hon. Theodore M. (Ted) Risenhoover

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

● Mr. RISENHOOVER. Mr. Speaker, the Flag Day Committee has invited Dr. Oral Roberts of Oklahoma to be special speaker in this Chamber at noon, June 14, when we commemorate the 201st anniversary of the birth of our flag.

The U.S. Air Force Band and the Singing Sergeants will perform. The joint services will provide the color guard. Our colleagues, Mr. LE FANTE, Mr. VENTO, and Mr. BEARD, who serve on the committee, will join in the ceremonies.

Our speaker is an evangelist who has taken his healing ministry to all continents and most countries. He says his parish is "the world of suffering humanity." To help that work, he established and is president of Oral Roberts University. He has lived with controversy but is one of the most forthright, sincere people that I have ever met.

About his healing by faith ministry, he once wrote:

Many things contribute to the healing process. A look, a word, a communication of the spirit helps. Surgical skill, medication, nursing care, play their part. And it is absolutely amazing what prayer can do when offered in a positive manner for a person who cooperates by releasing his faith at the same time. Miracles can and do happen.

In that respect, Dr. Roberts is now building "the city of faith," where medicine and faith will be practiced together.

I also want to share some of his other views, about our country and the flag it symbolizes. Dr. Roberts once addressed a group of freshly naturalized citizens and I ask unanimous consent to reprint part of that talk:

FLAG DAY

Today we are on a new kind of frontier in America. There are no more land runs. Most of the ethnic groups are here. We worked out many of our problems but now we face a Frontier of the Mind and the Spirit, which is the most difficult area of all.

It is hard to develop a new land. You know what it means to leave your old country and cross the ocean coming to a new land. It is hard. But now we are on a new kind of frontier that challenges us and will challenge you.

The Frontier of Economics. We have a problem of feeding, not only ourselves, but our world. Every farmer in America produces the average food supply for thirty other people, whereas in many lands the farmer is hard pressed to produce food for himself and two other people. We have a problem, an economic problem, of feeding the world. Only new creative processes will help us solve the food problem of the world.

We have labor problems; capital problems. All of it can be summed up in an economic problem that challenges every person in America to find ways and means of solving it.

Another problem is the educational problem. You know, in most other lands education is only for the privileged few, but our forefathers believed that every child should receive an education. But now it is the dream of this country that every boy and girl should receive a college education.

I came up in this state. I was born the son of poor parents, of an itinerant preacher, but I believe that it was in this state that something was bred in me where by faith in God, by initiative and hard work, I could accomplish whatever God had put in my heart. Oral Roberts University is one example.

Another frontier is in religion. A new spirit of ecumenicity, or a new spirit of family is coming into our country where we are not divided as we once were by sectarianism. Where each man can worship God and respect the other man as he worships God, eliminating bitterness and prejudice. We respect one another, but still keep our faith in God.

I am very happy about this development. That does not take away from your faith or from your relationship with your church, but it does mean that we respect the other man.

Another frontier is in the realm of healing. I mention that because of man's illnesses. The illnesses of his body, the illnesses of his mind, and most of all those in spirit. Finding new ways in medical healing, in spiritual healing, in the healing that comes to people by love and understanding. We are on a Frontier of Healing.

We are on a Frontier of Finding New Ways of Peace, because we have not found the way to live in peace, and if there is a prayer that any of us should pray, I think the prayer should be:

"Oh, God, give me peace in my heart and help me share that peace with at least one more person in my world." ●

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Friday, June 2, 1978

The House met at 10 o'clock a.m.

Rev. Jimmy Swaggart, Assembly of God Church, Baton Rouge, La., offered the following prayer:

Dear Heavenly Father, we have come to You in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. We thank You for all of Your many and gracious blessings. We realize America's might, power, and strength are only because of the blessings bestowed upon our great and good land. We thank You for this.

We pray for those who are in positions of authority. We realize in these trying times their load is heavy. We must depend upon You for guidance and strength. The decisions made affect the lives of multiple millions. Only You can give the guidance needed to make these types of decisions.

Again, we thank You. Again, we appreciate You; and again, we love You. We say all of this and ask it in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen and amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Without objection, the Journal stands approved.

There was no objection.

REV. JIMMY SWAGGART

(Mr. MOORE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a privilege to have one of my constituents, Brother Jimmy Swaggart, open our session with prayer today.

Brother Swaggart leads one of the largest evangelical ministries in the world. Each year through his efforts, the Word of God is brought to millions of homes in every corner of the globe.

Jimmy Swaggart preaches on a network of 300 TV and 600 radio stations each week. This year his ministry will take him to over 130 cities and towns, and he will travel more than 140,000 miles.

Also, he is an accomplished gospel singer and last year his albums sold more than 1 million copies.

Brother Swaggart's work is not confined just to this country. His works are heard in 15 foreign countries and in addition to his many missionary activities overseas, he is now building an evangelistic training center in Mombasa, Kenya.

Brother Swaggart is truly a good shepherd. I am pleased to welcome him to the House of Representatives and honored to introduce him to my colleagues.

THE LATE HONORABLE JAMES B. ALLEN

(Mr. NICHOLS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, the people of Alabama are in deep grief today in the loss of Alabama's junior Senator, JAMES B. ALLEN, who died of a massive heart attack last night in a hospital at Foley, Ala.

Most surely one of the mighty oaks for conservative government on the U.S. Senate has fallen.

It was my privilege to serve with Senator ALLEN when he presided over the Alabama Senate as Lieutenant Governor. He was extremely fair in his decisions and even then he knew the rule book from cover to cover. I knew him in his hour of deepest sorrow when he lost his wife in a tragic fire and his many friends throughout Alabama were pleased when some years later he married Maryon.

Mr. Speaker, JIM ALLEN ably represented my State and the Nation. In the U.S. Senate he stood tall—a mighty voice for conservative government. He believed in fiscal responsibility at all levels of government and was prudent in his own habits where the taxpayers' money was involved.

There are not enough superlatives in Webster's Dictionary to adequately portray the many admirable qualities of this great Alabamian. JIM ALLEN was a man of character, a man of much humility, a great Christian, a man of the highest moral fiber, who literally worked his heart out for all Alabamians whom he took great pride in serving.

He was dedicated to his work and his likes are not likely to pass this way again. The delegation from our State has lost a good friend—Alabama has lost an outstanding public servant, and the Nation has lost a great statesman. In the words of the Apostle Paul, "He has fought a good fight, he has finished his course, he has kept the faith."

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, I certainly want to join the gentleman from Alabama in expressing condolences and grief over the most untimely passing of this great American. It is obvious that not only has the State of Alabama lost a great servant of its people, but the entire United States will be worse because of the loss of this great American who served with such great distinction in the other body. Certainly we are not likely to find that kind of leadership at any time in the near future and we will miss him greatly.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I certainly join in the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama. It is a sad day for all Americans to learn of the passing of JIM ALLEN. As the gentleman knows, my State joins the great State of Alabama. We certainly have great respect for Senator ALLEN in Mississippi and I feel like he also belongs to us. I offer my condolences and sympathy to his family.

THE ARROGANT BUREAUCRACY OF THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION

(Mr. RISENHOOVER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RISENHOOVER. Mr. Speaker, out where I come from in Oklahoma it is considered improper to slip up behind a man and gut him while he is not watching; so I want this morning to again put the Federal Trade Commission on notice and seek the support of my colleagues to reduce by one-third the fiscal 1979 budget of the Federal Trade Commission. Printed in last Friday's RECORD is my statement detailing plans to amend the FTC's appropriation which now is scheduled for House consideration June 12.

The FTC is America's most out-of-control, arrogant bureaucracy, even worse than OSHA. That is a distinction—because the competition by other bureaucracies is fierce. It seems that being a faceless, self-anointed but nonelected dictator of a dominion has gained great appeal in this town.

Two interesting things have been done recently by the leader of the pack.

The FTC Chairman Mr. Michael Pertschuk, has spent considerable time lobbying members of the FTC's appropriations subcommittee about some cuts they voted in the budget for the FTC's strange attack on children's advertising. As an American citizen, Mr. Pertschuk has the constitutional right to "petition the Government for redress of grievances" under the first amendment and I hold that his lobbying is just fine.

However, at the same time, Mr. Pertschuk's agency has just written a new rule which prevents you—my elected colleagues—and me from talking freely with him about matters pending before the FTC.

In other words, Mr. Pertschuk has the right to talk freely to Congress about his problems. But elected representatives are denied the same unrestrained right to talk to him about hot coals he is pouring on the heads of the people we were elected to represent.

I think we can save money—and curb this nonsense—by simply cutting the FTC's budget. The FTC might just be the starter; there are others that need the same help.

Mr. Speaker, I am placing a more detailed position paper in the Extensions of Remarks today. I hope my colleagues will read it and my statement of last Friday.

This is one you can hang your hat on when you go home and tell the folks how you deal with the bureaucracy.

INTRODUCTION OF BILL TO PROTECT PRESS FROM UNWARRANTED SEARCH AND SEIZURE INTRUSIONS

(Mr. DRINAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. DRINAN. Mr. Speaker, this past Wednesday the Supreme Court held that law enforcement authorities may enter and search the premises of a newspaper armed only with a warrant issued upon probable cause that the newspaper may have in its possession evidence of a crime. Newspapers and others everywhere across the country have recognized the very serious implications of this unprecedented decision. It is little wonder that the Boston Globe editorialized and characterized the Supreme Court decision as a "first step toward a police state."

Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a bill which will help to secure freedom of the press and protect newspapers from unwarranted intrusions by law enforcement authorities. This bill would prevent any person acting under color of law from conducting any search or seizure on the premises of persons engaged in news gathering or dissemination without an adversary court proceeding. Such a proceeding would give the newspaper the opportunity to contest the search and possible seizure of its files and other materials.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that in due course this bill will be enacted.

A POINT OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE

Mr. PIKE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MINETA). The Chair has examined the newspaper article in question and feels that the gentleman from New York (Mr. PIKE) has a basis for a point of personal privilege.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. PIKE) is recognized.

Mr. PIKE. Mr. Speaker, I just want to show the Members of this august body the headline which brings me here in the well today. The headline says, and the story says: "Representative PIKE violated Securities Law, Judge Says."

I have been a lawyer for a long time, and I have never commented to the press on litigation in which I was involved. However, I do feel compelled, because of that headline in particular and that article, to read just one line or one sentence out of the decision in the case they are talking about. It appears on page 28 of a very lengthy decision, and here it is:

> Although for the reasons set forth in section II, supra Neuman stated a claim against Pike under the securities law on the facts found by me after trial, that claim has not been established, and I find for the defendant on this issue.

Mr. Speaker, other than the fact that they got the story exactly backward, it "ain't" a bad story.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

AMENDING AND EXTENDING THE EXPORT-IMPORT BANK ACT OF 1945

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 12157) to amend and extend the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BOLLING). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. NEAL).

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 318, nays 3, answered "present" 1, not voting 112, as follows:

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 12157) to amend and extend the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945, with Mr. MINETA in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee of the Whole rose on Thursday, June 1, 1978, all time for general debate had expired and the bill had been considered as having been read and open to amendment at any point.

Are there any further amendments to the bill?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. EVANS OF DELAWARE

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EVANS of Delaware: Page 4, strike lines 7 through 13 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(8) In no event shall the Bank guarantee, insure or extend credit or participate in the extension of credit (a) in support of any export which would contribute to enabling the government of the Republic of South Africa to maintain or enforce apartheid; (b) in support of any export to the government of the Republic of South Africa or its agencies unless the President determines that significant progress toward the elimination of apartheid has been made and transmits to the Congress a statement describing and explaining that determination; or (c) in support of any export to other purchasers in the Republic of South Africa unless the United States Secretary of State certifies that the purchaser has endorsed the following principles: non-segregation of the races in all work facilities; equal and fair employment for all employees; equal pay for equal work for all employees; initiation and development of training programs to prepare non-white South Africans for supervisory, administrative, clerical and technical jobs; increasing the number of non-whites in management and supervisory positions; and improving the quality of life for employees in such areas as housing, transportation, schooling, recreation and health facilities."

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, the country of South Africa brings to mind the practice of apartheid, of racism endorsed as a policy by the Government of South Africa. I abhor it. I detest it. And I do not believe there is anyone in this chamber that does not feel the same way. But I think the question before us is: How we, as a great Nation, a Nation that believes in human rights, can effect positive, reasonable and progressive change in South Africa?

We have identified a problem, and I respectfully suggest that we should be looking for a workable solution to that problem.

The current language in section 5 effectively prohibits any form of extension of credit to companies doing business in South Africa. This language I believe is counterproductive and clearly hurts American jobs and American exports at a time when we need both very badly. However, it also hurts economic opportunities for black South Africans who desperately need this opportunity. My amendment will encourage peaceful and progressive change.

It has three parts.

(A) It prohibits Ex-Im aid in support of any export which would contribute to maintaining or enforcing the policy of apartheid.

(B) The amendment specifically prohibits Ex-Im Bank support to the Government of South Africa. Since the Government of South Africa institutionalizes racism we should not give them direct aid.

But finally, (C), and I think most importantly, my amendment requires that companies which purchase U.S. exports must agree to adhere to fair employment practices as enunciated in the so-called Sullivan Doctrine.

I have known Rev. Leon Sullivan from Philadelphia for a long time and worked with him almost 10 years ago. I think most Members of this body know Dr. Sullivan to be a man who has worked diligently in helping the disadvantaged, the unemployed and in helping to train people for real productive jobs so that they can maintain a level of dignity that they might not otherwise be able to achieve without that kind of training and concern. Reverend Sullivan went to South Africa in 1974 and he came back and set up a code of ethics for American companies doing business in South Africa. They were called the Sullivan Principles—a code of conduct for American companies doing business there.

This amendment incorporates most of that code, including such fair and equitable principles as nonsegregation of the races in all work facilities, equal and fair employment for all employees and equal pay for equal work for all employees. By conditioning Eximbank credits and guarantees upon adherence to these principles, this country can make a progressive contribution to the plight of the black South Africans.

I think it is important also, Mr. Chairman, to distinguish between foreign aid, aid under the International Development Bank, the African Development Bank and aid directly through credits and guarantees of the Eximbank.

The Eximbank does not provide gifts to any country, but it is a way to promote American exports and creates jobs for Americans here at home.

Let me bring that down to something that I think all of you might be able to recognize: A billion dollars of exports means approximately 90,000 American jobs here at home and that is a pretty darned good investment, and that is what the Eximbank does.

My amendment allows the Eximbank support for U.S. exports to South Africa but does so in a way that will help black South Africans as well.

Mr. Chairman, if we want to promote American jobs here at home, if we want to promote South African jobs in South Africa, if we want to do something for black South Africans to allow them to achieve a level of dignity that they otherwise might not be able to achieve, then we will support this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(At the request of Mr. STANTON, and by unanimous consent, Mr. EVANS of Delaware was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. I yield to my friend, the minority leader of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STANTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I wish to extend compliments to the gentleman in the well. He has worked long and hard on an amendment. I think when the majority of the committee reads this, they will see that it allows American exporters to export American goods to South African industry—not the Government but to industry—in which they adhere to the principles which he calls and are referred to in American industry as the Sullivan agreement; is that correct?

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. That is correct.

Mr. STANTON. Among these are that they must practice nonsegregation of the races in eating establishments, and so forth, equal pay for all employees, and equal and fair employment practices for all employees.

I want to know specifically—perhaps the gentleman could tell me; he has done a lot of work on this—has he checked or has he come across how the people in South Africa, mainly the moderate blacks, for example, might look upon the gentleman's amendment? Does he have any idea?

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. First of all, I thank my friend, the gentleman from Ohio, for his kind and thoughtful comments.

Just by coincidence, I have a few comments that I might like to offer from, I think, from reasonable and fair black South Africans, and also some Americans who happen also to be black. I should like to read a couple of comments:

First of all, I should like to read a comment not from a black person but from the Baltimore Sun. It stated if we did not take this particular approach, "it would inflict great misery on South Africa's black majority and starve the movement for change."

Vernon Jordan, head of the National Urban League here in the United States, stated upon his return from a recent visit to South Africa, after meeting with black South African leaders there, that "to a person they were firm in their conviction that American corporations should not withdraw.

Ambassador Andrew Young, with whom I do not always agree, said in an interview with the Chicago Tribune on February 6, 1978, "that economic sanctions look like an easy answer, but South Africa is one of the most self-sufficient nations in the world."

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(At the request of Mr. STANTON, and by unanimous consent, Mr. EVANS of Delaware was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. EVANS of Delaware (continuing). "It could get along without us. In fact, their economy contributed about a half billion dollars to the U.S. economy yearly. If we cut off investments, we would lose jobs in this country, and we would not necessarily help blacks in that country."

In a recent interview with Columnist William J. Raspberry, Percy Qoboza, who is probably the leading black spokesman in South Africa, a leading journalist there, stated that:

> Disinvestment in South Africa would create economic chaos and guarantee a full-scale bloody racial confrontation which would unleash a blood bath such as we have never seen.

Chief Buthelezi, of South Africa, who is head of the Zulu Tribe consisting of 5 million South Africans, condemned the advocacy of withdrawal of foreign capital as a "sterile exercise because it does not help either side." Clearly, disinvestment is not in our economic interest, nor is it the way to encourage sound change in South Africa.

Mr. STANTON. I appreciate the gentleman's comments.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DICKINSON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to commend the gentleman for his amendment, and I certainly intend to support it. I would hope that the Members of this body would stop and think what we are doing. If we do not support this amendment, we cast ourselves in such a hypocritical position that it would be difficult to explain.

Cuba, Russia, all of the totalitarian countries, Uganda—there is barbed wire around them to keep the people in. This is not the case in South Africa. Their problem is to control the influx of population, of the blacks coming in to find jobs. This is their real problem. There are more blacks now than there were last year or the year before, and they are coming in because of the economic opportunities afforded South Africans. So regardless of the apartheid policies, which we abhor, I think to try to punish them economically and to deny them the opportunity of enhancing their industrial capacity by the expanded job opportunities, I think we are just being very foolish. I think that the gentleman's amendment is good. It is sound. I certainly support it. I think to use this as a device to inflict our will on them, which in turn really just creates more problems for the blacks in the country, which is reflected by the most liberal editors in South Africa, as well as most moderate blacks.

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Most responsible blacks.

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes; those with whom I have talked. They back the gentleman's position.

I think it is reasonable. I think it is moderate. I think it is sound. I certainly commend the gentleman. I intend to support it.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Delaware has expired.

(At the request of Mr. AUCOIN, and by unanimous consent, Mr. EVANS of Delaware was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

I just want to say that I strongly associate myself with the remarks the gentleman has made. I genuinely compliment the gentleman for the very thoughtful effort the gentleman has put into this amendment. It improves section 5 of the bill.

I think the statement the gentleman has reported to us from the head of the Zulu Tribe, which is the largest tribe in South Africa, really says it all.

I am quoting from the gentleman's "Dear Colleague" letter in which the gentleman quotes the head of that tribe in saying that an absolute ban on trade with South Africa would be a "sterile effort, because it does not help either side." It does not help South Africa or South Africans and it does not help the United States.

I just hope the House will have the good sense to reflect that wisdom when we approach the vote on the gentleman's amendment. I compliment the gentleman for putting forth a very thoughtful effort.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Of course, I yield to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Chairman, I just want to join the heavenly chorus and commend the gentleman on a very serviceable amendment. I think the gentleman has done a good job on it and I hope it will overwhelmingly pass.

Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Chairman, I want to join the heavenly chorus also, but with a few questions. I think this is an admirable approach of the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS), insofar as dealing with the problems of apartheid in South Africa, but there are a few provisions in here that concern me, not insofar as they would apply to South Africa, but insofar as they might not also apply elsewhere and we would not be aware of them.

For example, when the gentleman says equal and fair employment for all employees and equal pay for equal work for all employees, now, that is the principle that I strongly endorse.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Delaware has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. LaFALCE, and by unanimous consent, Mr. EVANS of Delaware was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I think what the gentleman has in mind in those phrases is coping with the policy of apartheid. Very often when we use that phrase in the United States, it is a terrible discrimination that has existed here for years against females. Most countries of the world do discriminate against females, regretfully, unfortunately. I think we should pass the equal rights amendment. I am wondering what the policy of South Africa is insofar as females are concerned and I am wondering what the applicability of this phraseology would be there.

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, I can only quote what an old friend in Dallas, Tex., once said: "That goals are ends to be achieved. That plans are the means to achieve them. The place is here, and the time is now."

I think the place is here and the time is now for us to send the message which is contained in my amendment.

Mr. LaFALCE. Does that mean the gentleman does not know?

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. It means I do not know completely. It is a start; it is not perfect. At least it is a start, and it is action we should take.

Mr. LaFALCE. Yes, but I think it is important that we find out what we are doing.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word, and I yield to the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLARZ).

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's yielding, but I have an amendment which I was planning to offer to the pending amendment. I think it would be appropriate for me to offer it first, and then we can conduct a colloquy on it later on, if that is what the gentleman had in mind.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. Chairman, I will direct my remarks to the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS).

In section (b) of the proposed amendment the language used refers to support for export sales to the South African Government or its "agencies."

In South Africa the government owns or has a controlling interest in a number of companies which are denominated "parastatal corporations." These include, for example, ISCOR, an iron and steel corporation; ESCOM, the government-owned electric utility; and SASOL, which is the oil company, and a number of corporations in the transportation field.

We understand it is the intention of the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS) that these important governmentally controlled corporations are included in the word, "agencies," as used in this subsection. We would like to inquire if this interpretation is, in fact, correct.

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TSONGAS. I yield to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak specifically, to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS), about coal companies or steel companies, but I can say that in section (b) there is a prohibition against support of exports to the Government of the Republic of South Africa or its agencies. I think that is rather specific, and if there is a quasi-governmental entity involved, it would in my estimation be covered.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, the original amendment on this issue, when it came up before the Committee on Banking, Finance, and Urban Affairs, was changed from a description of majority rule to one where the issue was the elimination of apartheid. I accepted that because I felt it was important to try to devise a workable amendment.

What we have today is a further eroding of what I think is important, the necessity for a statement by the United States relative to the situation in South Africa. South Africa is the only country in the world where racism is institutionalized. That is the first point.

The second point is that, whether we like it or not, the impression in South Africa is that the United States, and especially the U.S. Congress, is supportive of the white South African Government irrespective of our rhetoric, that the Carter administration is simply a voice crying in the wilderness, and that deep down the Congress feels that economics is more important than the principle of racial equality.

There have been a number of Members of this body and other people, including the Governor of New Hampshire, who have gone to South Africa and said, "Don't worry. We are supportive."

About 8 months ago, on September 12, 1977, South Africa came to a crossroads. That crossroads was marked by the death of Steve Biko. Steve Biko was the leading black moderate in South Africa. When he died, under the most brutal conditions, South Africa had a choice: To either move toward some sort of racial equality or to engage in what is referred to there as the laager mentality. They chose the latter course, and there has been a banning of many newspapers. The feeling of many moderates is that what we are now facing is the reality that the only course left to those in South Africa who are not white and who are seeking racial equality is violence.

That is a seed whose harvest is 4 or 5 years down the road, in the opinion of people like Donald Woods and others.

What is the U.S. position? We condemn South Africa. In the resolution offered by the gentlewoman from Illinois (Mrs. COLLINS) we condemned South Africa a few months ago overwhelmingly, but now we are talking about dollars and cents, and there are those who have said the United States would back down if it is in our own economic interests to do so. The people of the world are looking to this vote and this bill as an indication of just where we stand. This issue is really the litmus test for all of black Africa.

When the President went to Nigeria not that long ago, he wanted to talk about Cubans in Ethopia. He wanted to talk about Cubans in Angola.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. TSONGAS was allowed to proceed for 4 additional minutes.)

Mr. TSONGAS. The Africans did not want to talk about the Cubans. They wanted to talk about what the United States was doing in South Africa. That is the test. And it is interesting that this Congress should have this issue brought to it by the Banking Committee, which reflects, obviously, an interest in economic affairs.

Mr. Chairman, I am saddened that the original amendment is not likely to survive. I am prepared to accept the Evans language. However, I would like to ask the gentleman from Delaware, as we discussed last evening, whether it would be his intent, should he serve on the conference committee, to stick with the language of his amendment rather than negotiating with the Senate language, which was an even more watered down version.

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. If the gentleman will yield, in the event that I serve as a member of the conference committee, I would be very strong in my resolve to back the House language.

Mr. TSONGAS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, let me make two points, and then I will be finished.

One, the argument against the original language has been used to the effect that disinvestment is not the way to deal with the problems in South Africa. The issue before us today is not disinvestment. It is the use of U.S. facilities, the Eximbank.

And, secondly and sadly, to quote black African leaders who argue that we should have business as normal, overlooks two things: First, that many of the black leaders referred to are, in essence, on the payroll of the South African Government; and, secondly, there is something called the Terrorism Act, which says if you engage in that kind of dialog, you are then liable to 5 years in prison. And one would suggest just how much credibility you can put in the statements of those who, had they said otherwise, would have been in jail for 5 years, as many have been.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. TSONGAS. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. BAUMAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman, I think, does a great disservice to Percy Qoboza, who was quoted by the gentleman from Delaware, and who was, a few months ago, as the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) well knows, released from prison because of his outspoken position to apartheid. He has held the position throughout his public career as a moderate black leader, perhaps the major one in South Africa, that the economic welfare of the black people could only be enhanced by continued investment from the West, including the United States. He restated this even after he got out of prison, where he had been jailed by the government last year for his statements. Certainly he is not on the payroll of the government, and his advice is not in any way tarnished by support of apartheid. His criticism of the government has continued to this day. I think the gentleman knows that.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. Chairman, the point I was trying to make was this: The gentleman, having gotten out of jail, would be sensitve about going back in. If one looks at the statements of Steve Biko, who paid for his views with his life, one will find a different view. That is the point I was trying to make.

Mr. Chairman, I am prepared to accept this amendment, with some reluctance.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TSONGAS. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I want to congratulate the gentleman on his leadership on this matter and on his arguments he has just made.

Mr. Chairman, I also wish to associate myself with his remarks.

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TSONGAS. I yield to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I would like to congratulate the gentleman from Massachusetts for his very fair approach in accepting a reasonable approach which will protect American jobs and also do something about providing a workable solution in South Africa, a solution which will help black South Africans, as well.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) for bringing this important issue to our attention. He is an outstanding member of the committee and of this House, and we are going to miss him when he goes over to the Senate.

I would also like to commend the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS) for his thoughtful approach to perfecting this amendment.

What we are trying to say is that we do not want to contribute to encouraging the Government of the Republic of South Africa in its policies of apartheid. I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS) does that very adequately. We send the message in a sensible way, I think.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend both gentlemen, and I urge the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS).

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEAL. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Chairman, this House has before it a bill containing language ending all activities between the Export-Import Bank and South Africa. This policy question must be addressed on two planes. First, the additional restriction proposed with regard to South Africa must be carefully reviewed in relation to existing restrictions on Export-Import Bank services, and secondly, we must judge whether apartheid in South Africa is a special case in the international community deserving of special action.

To the point of existing restrictions, it is worthwhile to note what countries are now ineligible to one degree or another and what justification has been provided.

A total of 26 countries are currently "blacklisted" by the Export-Import Bank. Restrictions on 18 of these countries (Albania, Bulgaria, the People's Republic of China, Czechoslovakia, East Germany, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, North Korea, Vietnam, Outer Mongolia, Tibet, Cuba, the Soviet Union, Cambodia, Laos, and the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen) have been adopted pursuant to the legal requirement that the Bank not support transactions with Communist countries unless the President finds it to be in the national interest. I support this provision of the law and I do not quarrel with its intent. But it is important for us to recognize that the clear motives behind these restrictions are political and ideological.

Four countries (Rhodesia, Namibia, Transkei, and Bophuthatswana) are on the restricted list because we have never recognized them as legitimate nation states. The motive for restriction in these cases is diplomatic.

This leaves a group of countries (Uganda, South Africa, Chile, and Uruguay) which are subject to restrictions because of moral considerations and economic or political conditions within their borders. Apparently, the President, the Congress, and the Bank authorities have concluded these countries are special cases which deserve special restrictions.

I am not totally familiar with the policy reasons for the restrictions on Chile and Uruguay. But it is a fact that neither of these countries is eligible for direct Bank credits or financial guarantees. In the case of Uganda, the Bank is also prohibited from offering direct credits or financial guarantees. This is reasonable. I am confident we share a belief that the Bank should do nothing to underwrite commercial trade with Uganda so long as Idi Amin remains in power. Moreover, there is a moral component in our policy determination regarding Uganda. Amin practices genocide. This being the case, it is proper that the Bank do nothing that might contribute to a continuation of Amin's reign of terror.

It is in this context that we must determine what is to be done about South Africa. Currently, the Bank still provides financial guarantees for Bank loans to South Africa even though the Bank has adopted a tougher stance with regard to Uganda, Chile, and Uruguay.

I question whether the Bank's response to apartheid in South Africa should be any weaker than its response to genocide in Uganda. These are two great evils which challenge us to take a stand in defense of our principles. Special action is warranted to meet the challenges. Is there any less of a moral imperative for the Bank to cut its ties to South Africa than in the case of Uganda?

Often I am reminded by my friends at the State Department that consistency enhances the effectiveness of our policies. The Bank's response to special circumstances in South Africa and Uganda are inconsistent and we should act to correct this mistake.

I will not dwell on the question of whether apartheid in South Africa is a special case among nations which justifies special action. The answer is self-evident. The established social order in South Africa runs contrary to every impulse in my being. It is the only country in the world that has seen fit to codify and to institutionalize racism as a governing way of life. Apartheid flies in the face of all that we believe in as a people and all that we stand for as a nation.

Mr. Chairman, I would just like to add my words of commendation for both the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) and the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS) for this work.

I think South Africa is a special case which needs to be given a great deal of attention in this body and in the world. I think that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts did that; and the amendment to that amendment suggested by the gentleman from Delaware takes perhaps a somewhat more practical approach.

Mr. Chairman, I commend both of them for their good work.

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, just very briefly, I would like to join my colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS), in reluctantly accepting the amendment of my good friend, the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS). Given the position of the other body, this amendment provides a form of constructive compromise, rather than a conference stalemate. I could not let this time go by, however, without mentioning the outrageous conditions under which a vast majority of South Africans live, and without saying to this House that we can no longer sit back, as many did prior to the outbreak of World War II, and watch our country support a nation which treats fellow human beings like animals.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is advisable to have on record some of the statistics regarding the conditions in South Africa, where 84 percent of the population have no say whatsoever in governing their own country. Eighty-seven percent of the land is put aside for the 4 million whites, and the rest, 13 percent, has been designated as "homelands" for the 19 million blacks. The "homelands" that have been so designated have no mineral wealth, little arable land, next to no industry, minimal development potential, and simply serve as dumping grounds for the black population of South Africa. I would suggest to my friends and colleagues in this House that there is very little difference between these dumping grounds and the Nazi concentration camps which this Nation sat back and watched being built in the 1930's and which this country itself constructed for Japanese-Americans.

The list of atrocities is voluminous, but I would be remiss if I did not mention that in 1970 59 percent of the South African male workers were migrant workers, with no job security and no right to live with their families. In addition, an estimated 2 million people have been forcibly moved in South Africa to the "homelands," an action which we find intolerable in Communist countries but which we close our eyes to in Western nations. Last, and perhaps most despicable, every black over the age of 16 is required to carry a "passbook," containing fingerprints, race identity card, tribal connection, official permit to be in the area, record of payments of taxes, and employment and arrest records, to prove their right to be in a "white area."

In view of these repressive and racist activities, I would like to reaffirm to my colleagues that I support the gentleman from Delaware's (Mr. EVANS) amendment because I believe it will pass this Chamber and will be received favorably by our good friends in the other side of the Capitol. I would like to suggest, however, that in the future more needs to be done, and sooner or later this Nation, which prides itself as the great human rights advocate and leader of the free world, is going to have to take a very long, hard look at our association with a nation which treats the majority of its population as subhuman. We should think about the fact that we happen to be very outraged over the lack of Jewish emigration in Russia, but seem to be only slightly outraged over the treatment of 19 million black "nonpersons" in South Africa.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, it is with a great deal of regret that I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS).

My concern with the amendment is that the structure of the government and law in South Africa is so repressive and so heinous that it is so brutal that even if Vorster leaves, whoever comes in must operate under that totally terrible and repressive law.

I honestly do not believe that, given the apparent attitude of the Vorster government, given the structure of the law, we are going to see any discernible changes occur, even with the benefit of the gentleman's amendment. I am going to oppose it, but I do so reluctantly.

Let me cite to the Members very briefly some of the parts of law in South Africa. Members are familiar with the Internal Security Act of 1950, known as the "Suppression of Communism Act." It defines Communism—and this is important—as any doctrine which aims at bringing about any political, industrial, social, or economic change within the republic. That is communism under the South African law. This act, this Internal Security Act of 1950, permits the Minister of Justice to debar offenders from holding public office and to impose banning on them. I am convinced, my dear colleague, Mr. EVANS, that your amendment, no matter how well-intentioned it is, if it is going up against that kind of law, it is going to be relatively meaningless.

Let me cite for the Members the Public Safety Act of 1953, which allows the Government to declare a state of emergency, and thus to assume emergency powers such as arrest without warrant and detention—detention incommunicado—to counter actions or threatened actions which would "endanger public safety."

I submit that the gentleman's well-intentioned amendment and the intent of this House becomes meaningless in the face of that kind of law.

Let me cite another law, the general law amendment of 1963. It provides for arrest without warrant, detention incommunicado and without trial of political detainees for successive 90-day periods—not one, but successive 90-day periods. In 1964 the act was amended to provide for the imprisonment under the same terms of reluctant witnesses. The courts of South Africa have no power to intercede on behalf of persons detained under the act.

Finally, let me cite one other provision of law in South Africa, because I think if we deal with the structure of the law, we will see how puny and ineffective our attempt is today. The Terrorism Act No. 83 of 1967 created the offense of terrorism. Under section 6 of this act, persons charged with terrorism are subject to incommunicado in depth, deterrent detention without warrant, without charge or trial. Conviction under the Terrorism Act carries with it a mandatory minimum sentence of 5 years, or the maximum sentence of death. No court intercession is permitted in this case. Only the commissioner of police is permitted to order the release of a detainee.

This last act is the most stringent of South Africa's security laws. Let me indicate to you, my colleagues, that it was under this section 6 of the Terrorism Act that Stephen Biko was arrested, detained, and allowed to die a miserable and lonely death on a mat on a stone floor in a prison cell. That death took place on September 12, 1977.

There was no trial in the Biko case, and the mandatory sentence was administered.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, all that I have attempted to rehearse for the Members is bad enough, but what is absolutely heinous and horrendous was the reaction of South Africa after the murder of Steve Biko. In response to all of the international pressures and the indignation from leaders around the world, in response to the action taken by this House, a resolution of condemnation on the murder of Steve Biko, what did the Vorster government do? It announced, in the light of worldwide indignation, the banning of 18 civil rights organizations in South Africa and the arrest, death, or banning of some 50 black or white opponents of apartheid. That was the response.

And in the light of that response, I say to the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS), I do not think his amendment or the action of this House is going to have any effect on the ending of apartheid in South Africa.

Some say that the Congressional Black Caucus has taken a hard position. Perhaps we have, but it is a hard situation that we deal with. Our position calls for total economic sanctions against South Africa: Total.

The arguments will be raised that if we impose total economic sanctions against South Africa around the world, we really hurt the black people of South Africa. Well, maybe we will, but I would suggest to the Members that in any struggle for human dignity someone suffers, and I think the black Africans have indicated their willingness to suffer in the struggle because some of them have died and have gone through this kind of hell.

Let me rehearse for the Members, as I did in the Banking Committee when we were discussing this issue, some of the arguments I heard against our own civil rights struggle in this country. It was suggested that if we pushed too hard for school integration, we would hurt some poor little black children. Somebody gets hurt in a monumental push for change. When we pushed for an end to segregation in public accommodations, the argument was made: Would we not be hurting black people? Well, maybe so, but I would rather suffer temporary hurt than the permanent hurt of my personhood and manhood being stripped away from me.

I am convinced the majority of black Africans in South Africa would take that similar position. As one of our great patriots said: "Give me liberty or give me death." And if Patrick Henry could say that, then the South Africans can also say that.

This amendment is well intentioned and a decent gesture, but is a meaningless and futile gesture in the light of that enormously repressive regime that has its repression built in under law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. MITCHELL was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to the gentleman that I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware is a sensible compromise position. I understand there will be an amendment offered to strike the whole section, and I guess our choices are between this amendment and nothing, and I just wanted to mention that to the gentleman.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. I understand.

Mr. NEAL. I just wanted to indicate that to the gentleman.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. I understand, and perhaps it is a sensible mid position. This one Member must ask: Can one take a mid position against evil? Could one take a mid position against Hitler? Could one take a mid position against any of the enormous evils that this world has seen? This Member cannot.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

It has been my experience both in conversations with Donald Woods and a black minister Gatcha Buthelezi that they espouse the position the gentleman takes today and that is when there are 18 million blacks in the government and 70,000 working in corporations and possibly making more in wages than the average black does, that they recognize that some of those people will be the first people laid off and those will be the ones that will be suffering and they will be very willing to do that.

Because they recognize that if there is to be change in South Africa, as there must be, that some of the people who have the good jobs are the ones who are going to suffer, and they are willing, ready and able to do that.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. I thank the gentleman for his comments, and they are completely accurate.

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. I yield to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, I think my friend the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. MITCHELL, is aware that I understand his position. I want him to understand my position that it is in no way endorsing the South African Government policy of apartheid. It is only perhaps a small step in the alleviation of human suffering. I think we should take that step wherever it may be, whether it be here in America or in South Africa.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

(On request of Mr. EVANS of Delaware, and by unanimous consent, Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me the additional time. Let me say to the gentleman from Delaware, believe me, Mr. EVANS, I understand your deep sensitivity on this issue and your concern. Maybe I am wrong, maybe I am. I do not think that I am. My argument is you cannot compromise with total evil. You cannot take a midpoint with total tyranny. My argument is whenever you have monumental evil constructed by man then there is no point of conciliation between that which is right, that which is moral and that which is evil.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. I am happy to yield to the gentlewoman from New York, Ms. HOLTZMAN.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I commend the gentleman for his statement.

Mr. Chairman, what concerns me about this amendment, which I believe is very well intentioned and decent, is that in many respects it would have no teeth. What concerns me particularly is the statement in subparagraph (c) that the purchaser need only endorse certain principles; the purchaser is not required to implement any of those principles.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

(On request of Ms. HOLTZMAN, and by unanimous consent, Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Ms. HOLTZMAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will continue to yield, let me say that my understanding is that purchasers within South Africa can be barred by law from implementing these provisions. In other cases long-standing customs may stand in the way.

For example, it is my understanding that there is a custom in South Africa that generally prevents whites from working for blacks. How then can there be prompt implementation of the provision in this amendment for increasing the number of nonwhites in management and supervisory positions?

I am troubled by the fact that there is no requirement that the purchaser implement the principles contained in this amendment or carry out those principles in any respect.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. The gentlewoman from New York (Ms. HOLTZMAN) is so right. That is why I attempted to cite the South African law. For instance, if anyone indeed attempted to move toward a bettering of conditions in South Africa, then, under the Internal Securities Act, which defines communism as "any doctrine which aims at bringing about any political, industrial, social, or economic change within the Republic," that law would supersede and negate those efforts. The gentlewoman from New York (Ms. HOLTZMAN) is exactly right.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, let me say that I agree with the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. MITCHELL), and the gentlewoman from New York (Ms. HOLTZMAN), about the fact that there is no provision for implementation.

I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if I could ask that the amendment be amended by adding "and implement" after the word "endorse?"

Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. MITCHELL), would yield to the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS), to reply to my inquiry?

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. I yield to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding. Let me say this: You know, if you say "implement" that connotes getting it all done and having it all finished. I do not think we have gone that far in the United States of America. I think if you were to change this that a better wording would be "proceeding toward implementation of."

Mr. TSONGAS. I accept the gentleman's proposed change to his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the Chair could rule on the proposed unanimous-consent request?

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requiste number of words and I rise in support of the proposed amendment, if that is still the proper parliamentary situation.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. Chairman, has the Chairman ruled on the proposed modification of the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the Chair has not put the question on the unanimous-consent request to modify the amendment before the Committee in view of the fact that the Chair is not sure at the moment what the exact language change would be.

The gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I have a few specific points. U.S. business investment in South Africa has become a strong and positive force in advancing racial equality; economic sanctions would only serve to nullify this growing influence.

If American corporations were forced to withdraw from South Africa, the first to suffer would be black South Africans themselves.

Black leaders in South Africa oppose restrictions on U.S. investments.

This section is an expression of selective morality, since it would not affect other nations whose human rights record leaves more to be desired than does South Africa's.

Restrictions on U.S. trade with South Africa could breed a dependence of the United States on the Soviet Union.

South Africa is making social progress as shown by that nation's adoption of the Western-sponsored Namibia plan, its official endorsement of the "Sullivan principles," and the South African Government's announcement that nonwhites would be permitted to register in private schools.

I think the point has been very well made that this amendment is intended to be a practical step toward what would be a progressive economic development in South Africa. I think the test of it will come after a period of years if it is in our law and if results are achieved because of it. I do not think anyone can say this morning that it will or will not produce utopia. So I would suggest we adopt the amendment and give it a chance.

I would also suggest, Mr. Chairman, that more Members should look at the entire continent of Africa and be as concerned with abuses in other countries. For example, in the Central African Empire, the general, who some years ago by coup d'etat became president for life, had himself declared an emperor. In the process of the coronation, news report stated that 20 percent of the national budget went for the cost of a coronation ceremony that is in a country where 95 percent of the people barely exist at subsistence level. That is a denial of human rights. I wish that somehow through this bill, or any other vehicle, we could address that kind of problem as well.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DERWINSKI. I yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. FENWICK. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to speak to these two amendments which I feel very strongly about. I do think that the Evans amendment is a wise and prudent amendment. I know some effects of the Sullivan code in Africa, and so the law must allow it. In one company with 60 percent black employees and 24 supervisory personnel, 4 of those supervisory personnel are black. There are integrated washrooms, integrated cafeterias, equal pay for equal work. This is true in at least one of the companies which has adopted the Sullivan code. Therefore, it is possible to implement it and in practical ways it has made practical small improvements in the companies that adopt it, and in the lives of the employees.

Nevertheless, my heart is with the original Tsongas amendment in the bill. Somewhere there must be a symbol. Practical things are essential in everyday life, and they must be adopted. And I can see the good effort here of the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS) and the general acceptance of his amendment in this House; but we have people all over the world, not just in Africa, with pass cards unable to go from one section of their country to another without the permission of the police, with thousands of people in thought-reformation camps and concentration camps and labor camps. Millions are being killed. We know what is happening in the countries of this world, and somewhere there must be a symbol, a stand for decency. That is why, with great regret, I still support the original Tsongas amendment. My heart is there. It is a symbol of something we honestly mean. Certainly we cannot deny that the Sullivan code is producing small improvements one by one in different industries in Africa. I am not denying that. I think the Evans amendment is well intentioned, and I know how sensitive is the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS) on this whole question, but my heart remains with the original amendment in the bill.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DERWINSKI. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STANTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, we have a parliamentary situation in which unanimous consent was requested. I do not think the Chair heard it, nor was it clear, that the Evans amendment, now having been read, is by unanimous consent changed to the following: Where we have in the present language, "The purchaser has endorsed the following principles," it is my understanding, and I ask unanimous consent that the language read: "The purchaser has endorsed and is proceeding toward the implementation of principles."

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair would like to clarify the unanimous consent request. Following the word "endorsed," the addition is "and is proceeding toward the implementation of."

Mr. STANTON. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BAUMAN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I think it would be the better procedure to reduce this to writing and to offer it as an amendment at some point shortly, so there is no question as to exactly what the substance is. I know at least one other Member has been trying to get recognition to offer an amendment. I would hope the gentleman would withdraw his request.

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, I will be happy to withdraw it.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, I do have an amendment which I will be happy to offer, but I understand there is an amendment here to be offered by the gentleman from New York, Mr. SOLARZ, which he had hoped to offer even earlier than mine, if we can wait on mine.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. SOLARZ TO THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. EVANS OF DELAWARE

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SOLARZ to the amendment offered by Mr. EVANS of Delaware: Page 4, strike lines 7 through 13 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(8) In no event shall the Bank guarantee, insure or extend credit or participate in the extension of credit (a) in support of any export which would contribute to enabling the government of the Republic of South Africa to maintain or enforce apartheid; (b) in support of any export to the government of the Republic of South Africa or its agencies unless the President determines that significant progress toward the elimination of apartheid has been made and transmits to the Congress a statement describing and explaining that determination; or (c) in support of any export to other purchasers in the Republic of South Africa unless the United States Secretary of State certifies that the purchaser has endorsed the following principles: non-segregation of the races in all work facilities; equal and fair employment for all employees; equal pay for equal work for all employees; initiation and development of training programs to prepare non-white South Africans for supervisory, administrative, clerical and technical jobs; increasing the number of non-whites in management and supervisory positions; a willingness to engage in collective bargaining with labor unions; and improving the quality of life for employees in such areas as housing, transportation, schooling, recreation and health facilities."

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Chairman, I will be relatively brief. I agree with the general thrust of the observations and remarks of my very good friend, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. MITCHELL), but it seems to me that the political and parliamentary realities of the situation which confronts us today is that, for better or for worse, rightly or wrongly, the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS) is going to be adopted and if it is going to be adopted I think one significant omission in the amendment should be remedied.

The amendment of the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS), as the Members of the Committee know, essentially embodies the so-called Sullivan code. But one of the deficiencies in the Sullivan code is that it makes no provision for negotiations with black labor unions. My amendment would remedy that deficiency by adding to the list of principles which must be both endorsed, and hopefully implemented, a willingness to engage in collective bargaining with black labor unions as well as white.

I would point out the the Members of the Committee that there is no prohibition in South African law against collective bargaining with black labor unions. There is, however, no requirement in South African law that industrial enterprises engage in collective bargaining with black or other labor unions. What this amendment would do is simply add to the list of principles a willingness on the part of the relevant enterprises to engage in collective bargaining with labor unions. It would not obligate them in any way, shape, manner or form, to agree to any labor union demand which was a violation of South African law. All that it would require them to do is to engage in a collective-bargaining process.

I would submit to the Members of the Committee that in the final analysis the improvements which are going to have to take place in the conditions and circumstances of the black and colored majority in South Africa will ultimately result, in the most significant measure, from the efforts of the black and colored peoples of that country themselves. As helpful as the various principles in the Sullivan code may be, there is no substitute for what can be accomplished by a labor organization representing the interests of the workers themselves. I think that we would have accomplished little, even with the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS), if we do not include in the list of principles mentioned therein a willingness to engage in collective bargaining with labor unions, so that the black and colored workers of that country will at least have an opportunity to make their case on their own behalf with the relevant employers to whom this legislation applies.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOLARZ. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman knows, the gentleman brought this to our attention today. We can look upon this amendment in a couple of ways. I think it is important, at least to me, to know and clarify a couple of specific points. It is not, from what the gentleman has said, the gentleman's intention at all to force a labor union upon an industry in South Africa: is that correct?

Mr. SOLARZ. There is no intention to force any particular union on anybody.

Mr. Chairman, all that the amendment would require a relevant enterprise to do is to engage in collective bargaining with any legal, legitimate labor union that represents the employees in that enterprise.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has stated that he has the knowledge, and I do not have sufficient knowledge on this subject. Do I understand there is no such thing as a right-to-work law in South Africa?

I want to be sure, No. 1, that we are not going to do anything that would be contrary to South African law.

This does not force anything upon them in any way, except for negotiation and discussion purposes, and mainly the gentleman's point—and he must have some basis for this—is that black labor unions should be involved at least in discussions on this subject?

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Chairman, I can assure the gentleman that this is not a disguised repeal of any right-to-work provisions that may exist in South African law.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLARZ) will yield, I might be able to help with the gentleman's inquiry.

In January of this year the other body, under the chairmanship of the senior member of the State of Iowa in the Senate, produced a very excellent report, and on that particular point they said that although not legally prohibited, black unions are officially recognized by the South African Government, which fears the political consequences of the black labor movement in a society in which 70 percent of the population is black.

So they clearly are not legally prohibited.

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Chairman, that is the point I was trying to make.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLARZ) has expired.

(On request of Mr. DOWNEY, and by unanimous consent, Mr. SOLARZ was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Chairman, if I may continue, there is no existing prohibition in South African law against black labor unions, so the inclusion of this amendment in a list of principles to which the enterprises would have to subscribe would not require anyone to violate South African law. But in the absence of this provision, I think the amendment would be seriously inadequate.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOLARZ. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Chairman, once again, I wish to quote from the statement to which I referred because it supports entirely the gentleman's position. We are talking here about the South African Government:

> It tolerates the existence of scores of black unions that are of little effectiveness today.

Obviously it would be our position to try to encourage those black unions more effectively. I might add, interestingly enough—and I hope this does not hurt the gentleman's position—that not a single U.S. firm negotiates in collective bargaining with a single South African trade union, and that is a circumstance we might want to change.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLARZ) has again expired.

(On request of Mr. EVANS of Delaware, and by unanimous consent, Mr. SOLARZ was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOLARZ. I yield to my friend, the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question about an IBM subsidiary, for example, operating in South Africa. IBM does not have a union, as the gentleman knows, but I think the company has tried to establish some very high principles in terms of fair employment practices.

Would this particular language prohibit any form of credit or guarantee to an IBM subsidiary operating in South Africa?

Mr. SOLARZ. Absolutely not. All this would require is that, if there is a labor union in the subsidiary and it is a legitimate union, they would have to be willing to engage in collective bargaining with it. But if there is no union, the amendment would not require them to go out and organize one, nor does it require the Eximbank to deny them credit because they are not negotiating with a union, if there is no union with which to negotiate.

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, I would appreciate it if the gentleman would afford me an opportunity to read the language of the amendment very briefly.

I will ask the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLARZ), is he talking here about existing labor unions?

Mr. SOLARZ. This amendment would apply to a situation where there is an enterprise in which there is a legitimate labor union.

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. I understand.

Mr. SOLARZ. Under those circumstances the enterprise would be obligated to engage in collective bargaining with that union.

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I will not object to his amendment.

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I want the Members to know how much I have enjoyed this exhilarating discussion about human relations. I have been just fascinated. I do not know what in the world it has to do with the Eximbank, but it certainly has been interesting.

The purpose of the Eximbank is to try to extend and create exports for our country, to improve our industry, to provide work for our people, and to deal in a commercial world on commercial terms. But suddenly we have deviated from that, and we are now having a very interesting discussion about human relations.

I would like to just say that the principal amendment is certainly one I am going to support, because I am sufficiently sensitive to be able to understand the difference between a whack in the shins and a hit in the head. I think that the committee bill provides a hit in the head, and I think the principal amendment provides a whack in the shins. I like a whack in the shins better than I like a hit in the head, so I am going to support the principal amendment.

Mr. Chairman, what I would like to discuss, for just a moment, is what we are about to do here. We are getting ready to send American salesmen representing manufacturers out into commerce and into the world markets, and we are getting ready to tell those who would be our prospective customers that "if you deal with the United States, we have quit bribing people now. What we do now to sell is to insult them." We are going to tell them how to run their country.

Just take the amendment we have in the process right now. In the United States, we have absolute unanimity on the benefits of unionism. Everyone in America loves the unions. Everyone in America understands that there is no contribution by the unions to the terrible inflation that is ripping our economy. We all love the unions. It is great. And we want to pass on this good stuff to the rest of the world and we want to tell South Africa, "If you are going to buy our goods, we are going to have to deal with the unions, because we love them so much, we have so much unanimity."

And so what we are going to do now is, we are not going to go into a world market where our competitive ability is already diminishing, in the steel industry, in the shipbuilding industry, in our maritime industry, and other principal and basic industries upon which our vitality and existence depend. So instead of dealing with what the Eximbank is about, to try to help the American people, we are suddenly turning this into some sort of device that will help some stalwart Americans like Andrew Young to posture for local politics while he decimates our position in Africa and while he creates a situation where the choice is either Red or dead in Africa as a result of going to run the risk of having to send Americans to fight. And it is not a question of blacks or whites. Twenty-five percent of the American Army is black. They are loyal Americans. And if we go into Africa, they are going to die and bleed like everyone else.

So clearly what the proposition is, what we are trying to do, for purely domestic political purposes, is to try to turn the Eximbank a commercial institution, which has proven to be in the best interest of our country, into some kind of a political device that has nothing to do with politics or with the tides of the next election.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLARZ) to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. MAGUIRE TO THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. EVANS OF DELAWARE

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MAGUIRE to the amendment offered by Mr. EVANS of Delaware: In subsection (8)(c) line 12 after the word "endorsed," insert the following: "and is proceeding toward the implementation of".

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, I think the debate of the last few minutes indicates that the House is prepared to accept this language. It has been agreed to, I believe, by the sponsor of the principal amendment.

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAGUIRE. I yield to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. MAGUIRE) is perhaps an improvement. It qualifies more specifically what we are talking about. I do not think we necessarily need it because I think there is, in this use of the word "endorsed," an inference that indicates a move "toward implementation of"; but I have no objection to the gentleman's language.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAGUIRE. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, we accept the amendment on this side.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from North Carolina.

I do want to make a couple of remarks as to why I think this amendment is important.

The difficulty we have had in our policy toward South Africa in the past as a government—and also with respect to the expression of intentions by U.S. corporations—has been that there has been a rather substantial gap between what we say and what we do.

At the very least, Mr. Chairman, asking that corporations not only endorse, but also show that they have proceeded toward implementation is a step away from a reliance on rhetoric alone and a step toward saying, "Let us finally do something."

I must say, though, that in my mind—and I share the concerns and the views expressed by the gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. FENWICK) a moment ago—we probably would have been better advised if we had gone forward with the original language that came from the committee.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to support the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS), but I honestly do so with some reluctance. The fact of the matter is that we have some of our private banks and corporations now making decisions which go beyond what the U.S. Government has yet indicated a willingness to do. Some U.S. banks, for example, some of the largest ones, are saying that they will not give additional loans to the South African Government or its agencies. Some investors are saying they will not increase their investments. The difficulty with the Evans approach is that it does not clearly enough take the necessary next step, which to say that the U.S. Government is not going to take U.S. tax dollars or apply a U.S. stamp of approval to additional increments in our economic relationships with some Africa.

Mr. Chairman, I very much wish that we were doing that today because I think the time has long since come. It is clear that we have not assisted in stimulating change for the better in South Africa over the last couple decades, on the theory that a few corporations and some economic relationships would change the situation gradually.

As the gentleman from New York (Mr. DOWNEY) pointed out earlier, there are only 70,000 black South Africans who work for American corporations out of a nonwhite population of 19 million. I think we are kidding ourselves if we think we are going to be able gradually, through economic relationships, to improve the situation there. In fact, the history of the last few decades and of the last 2 years in particular demonstrates to me that theory is bankrupt.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I would have hoped that we would have taken at least this first step with respect to Eximbank guarantees and that we would have said that we are not going to offer further guarantees unless significant progress is made toward the elimination of apartheid.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) made a very good point earlier. Nobody is saying, "Let us take out what is there." We are simply saying with this provision, "Let us not proceed further with officially sanctioned additions to what we have done already in our economic relationships."

Mr. Chairman, we are falling short of that today. I think one can argue, even on economic grounds, that in a situation as potentially explosive as South Africa's, the economic risks alone exceed what the U.S. Government and, therefore, the U.S. taxpayer should be guaranteeing through the bank. And surely the U.S. Government should not be encouraging commercial bankers and exporters to further involve themselves in a country whose abhorrent racial policies are perpetuated in part as a result of the strength which outside investment gives to the regime, a point made very forcefully recently in a report issued by the other body, under the leadership of Senator CLARK of Iowa.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAGUIRE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Chairman, first of all, I would like to commend the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. MAGUIRE) on his statement and on his amendment; and I would like to associate myself with his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. MAGUIRE) has expired.

(On request of Mr. DOWNEY and by unanimous consent, Mr. MAGUIRE was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. DOWNEY. The gentleman mentioned some of the U.S. corporations. I think that we might want to mention two of them by name which deserve to be singled out for their wise activity. The first is the Chase Manhattan Bank, which has established a policy of not providing loans to the South African Government, its statutory corporations, the homelands, border industries, or to Namibia. The recent activity of the Polaroid Corp., I think, is also representative of the type of responsible corporate activity, that we should encourage. It is my hope that our Government can follow their very effective and wise action.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I thank the gentleman. I might add City Bank to that list. But, I think the key point here, the key problem is the South African Government, its structure of law, its institutionalized race system, which permeates every aspect of South African life: Civil, political, economic, as the gentleman from New York (Mr. McKINNEY) and Maryland (Mr. MITCHELL) so eloquently stated. Unless we get serious as a Government and as a people about addressing that issue directly rather than trying to do it by proxy through U.S. corporations, I think we are not going to make any significant progress.

Mrs. COLLINS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAGUIRE. I yield to the gentlewoman from Illinois.

Mrs. COLLINS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, although I am sympathetic to the intentions to be sought by this amendment, I am compelled to rise in opposition to it, in the context of the legislation before us today.

The thrust of section 5 of the Eximbank authorization bill is to further the disengagement of our Government from its tacit support for the Government of South Africa and the abhorrent system of racial segregation and discrimination which it enforces on an unwilling majority. The amendment before us would substitute a set of good intentions for such an effective policy of disengagement.

American business involvement in South Africa is sometimes justified on the grounds that an expanding South African economy will ultimately benefit all South African citizens, white and black alike. While this argument might have some merit in instances where U.S. business contributes to equitable economic growth, it fails to apply to South Africa, for the simple reason that under that country's system of government, the black majority is denied the benefits of citizenship and is therefore precluded from participating in the benefits of economic prosperity. Short of radical social, economic and political change in South Africa, I cannot imagine how the maintenance of U.S. trade can possibly play a constructive role in the transition to majority rule.

Moreover, I wish to point out that while I respect the efforts of the Rev. Leon Sullivan to obtain for South African workers the equal opportunity provisions that he has worked so hard and successfully to secure for black workers here in the United States, I find the statement of principles he advocates somewhat lacking in clout, considering the extreme system of economic exploitation that prevails in South Africa. While in the abstract, the Sullivan principles make unobjectionable reading, the catch lies, as Jennifer Davis has recently pointed out, in an analysis published in the Southern Africa Perspectives of the Africa fund, in what the principles exclude. Specifically, and unlike the code of corporate conduct recently adopted by the European Economic Community, the Sullivan principles include no demand for negotiations with black trade unions or for their recognition by the South African Government. No wonder that the principles were hastily endorsed by 54 U.S. companies with operations in South Africa and even by the South African Government itself, for there is little here that challenges the structure of apartheid.

As Ms. Davis expresses it succinctly in the introduction to her analysis of the Sullivan principles: "Africans are not struggling and dying to reform or improve apartheid. They want nothing less than the total abolition of the system and the establishment of a new state based on full popular particiption. To propose change in any lesser terms is trivial and irrelevant."

Mr. MAGUIRE. I thank the gentlewoman, and I wish to associate myself with the substance of her remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. BIAGGI and by unanimous consent Mr. MAGUIRE was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAGUIRE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BIAGGI. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and congratulate him for improving what I believe is a very sound and progressive amendment.

I have looked at the provisions of this amendment, and I endorse it heartily, but I would like to compare the conditions it addresses itself to, to similar conditions that exist in Northern Ireland. One of the principles is no segregation of the races, no separate work facilities. Well, that is the condition in South Africa, and it is abominable. In Northern Ireland there is segregation on a religious and economic basis, and it is just as intolerable.

Another principle is fair employment for all employees. The abuse of this condition exists in Northern Ireland and has continued for years and does continue there now. It is just as immoral there as it is in South Africa.

Then, there is equal pay for equal work. That condition is one that must be corrected in Northern Ireland as well. Development of training programs to prepare nonwhite South Africans for administrative and clerical jobs; I dare say it is as flagrant in South Africa as are the flagrant violations of this in Northern Ireland

Increasing the number of nonwhite management and supervisory positions; there is a classic illustration with relation to Catholics in business and government in this regard. Improving the quality of life in special areas such as housing, transportation, schooling, recreation, health facilities; the same conditions exist in Northern Ireland. All these are intolerable in Rhodesia, in South Africa, and in Northern Ireland.

The point I am making is this: The amendment is sound, and I support it. We are dealing with a denial of human rights, but if we are to be, as the President has declared, the apostle of human rights throughout the world, then that principle should be universally applied. If we do not do that, we will be hypocritical and employ double standards, hence we will be false to those that we preach to. Yes, in South Africa the conditions should be corrected, and I hail the maker of the amendment and all of those who have improved the quality of that amendment, but I also suggest that this is not the only place.

These very same conditions exist in Northern Ireland, and should be addressed. It is our responsibility as the leading advocate of human rights to address ourselves in that particular neglected area of Northern Ireland.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, it is my hope and intention to urge my colleagues to come away from this effort to try to turn what has been a very profitable institution for American industry into a device of politics. We are now adding additional conditions upon South Africa's dealing with the United States.

South Africa is a trading partner whose trade amounted to $2.5 billion in the last year.

Our industry is starved for trade. We are so starved for employment that the Government is buying employment for our people—our people.

The discussion about improving conditions of human rights throughout the world is a worthy discussion, but it should not be superimposed upon our desire to try to help our own people. America is in trouble.

Last year we came up short $27 billion. Now, $27 billion does not mean anything to the Members of this Congress, but to the people out in the streets $27 constitutes a pretty good bit; $27,000 is astronomical; and $27 billion is the difference between national survival and not surviving.

We just cannot continue to bleed this way. We need to do something to help our own people in a constructive and productive way. That is what the Export-Import Bank is about.

Let me remind the Members of the magnitude of what we are doing here. We are attempting to deal with an institution to which this legislation commits a total amount of $40 billion to try to help our industry. Now that is important to everybody, to rich and to poor and to everyone else. And to try and cause this to be something that is going to be used as an instrument to embarrass us commercially in the world markets, to try to embarrass us militarily, or to try to embarrass us from the standpoint of making sense in the world is not reasonable.

One cannot be a salesman in the world and go forth and have the first thing out of his mouth be an insult to customers.

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

I compliment him for pointing out the record trade deficit this country is suffering today. I think implicit in his remarks is the fact that the dollar as a consequence is weakening.

William Miller, the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, testified before the Banking Committee that because of the drop of the dollar we have had in recent months there has been almost a full percentage point increase in inflation.

These are factors that we need to recognize as we legislate on the Eximbank. I think I understood the gentleman to say that it may be unwise to mix politics and trade and for that reason I assume, then, that the gentleman, accepting that principle, is going to support section 6 of this bill which is designed to strike a blow for that very same principle that he enunciated?

Mr. KELLY. The gentleman is not entirely safe in that assumption.

Mr. AUCOIN. If the gentleman will yield still further, I am sorry, then, that the gentleman applies a principle to one section of the bill but that he is unwilling to apply to another section of the bill. But the gentleman can be forgiven for the inconsistency of his principles.

Mr. KELLY. I would like to point out to the gentleman that this is a precedent that has been established here. This legislation in section 5 does not make any sense. All this House is doing in section 5 is embarrassing an ally, a military ally, a trading partner, a nation upon which we have been able to depend upon for the millennium, which is now being embarrassed while we are embracing Communist nations for which we have no respect at all. That is exactly the point I have made, that you have been able to hold your nose and embrace communism but you say that you are too delicate to handle the prospects of South Africa.

Mr. AUCOIN. The gentleman has mentioned my name.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

(On request of Mr. AUCOIN and by unanimous consent, Mr. KELLY was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. AUCOIN. Would the gentleman yield to me? He mentioned my name.

Mr. KELLY. Yes, I would be very happy to yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. AUCOIN. I appreciate the gentleman yielding because he made an inaccurate statement.

My position on this bill is that trade should be neutral. The gentleman knows I supported a neutral approach in the subcommittee, the full committee, and here on the floor. There is no inconsistency in my viewpoint.

And I am interested in the fact that the gentleman says we do not have to make sense and I would say he seems to have achieved that.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, I want to apologize to the gentleman, and I want that apology to be without any kind of equivocation. And that was a misstatement. I think it had more to do with our brothers than it did to the colloquy between the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. AUCOIN) and myself.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of personal privilege. The speaker in the well has indicated some language referring to our colleague, the gentleman from Oregon, (Mr. AUCOIN).

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Maryland is not in order in raising a point of personal privilege in the committee.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman in the well from Florida (Mr. KELLY) used some language directed at my colleague that I do not think he meant to use, and, in all fairness, I think the gentleman ought to be given the opportunity to withdraw his words.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the Chair believes he did hear the gentleman from Florida (Mr. KELLY) express an apology to the gentleman from Oregon, Mr. AUCOIN.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. The gentleman from Florida (Mr. KELLY) did apologize?

Mr. KELLY. Yes, and the apology was without any equivocation.

Mr. AUCOIN. That is right.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. I thank the Chair and the gentleman.

Mr. KELLY. If there is a better way to make it stronger, please assist me.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I have taken this time in part to address a question or two to the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS), the author of the major amendment, which has been pending for an hour and a half.

In the first proviso of your amendment the language reads that the bank is prohibited from doing certain things, which would contribute toward enabling the Government of the Republic of South Africa to maintain or enforce apartheid.

I assume that it could be argued that any assistance to a private company trading with South Africa, even one which might adhere to the principles set forth in subsection (c) of this amendment, would indirectly aid the Government in its policy.

My question is, is it the intention of the gentleman that subsection (a) in any way negates subsection (c), if the applicant for the export aid agrees with the principles?

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAUMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BAUMAN) let me say that that is not my intent at all. The intent here is to just codify the U.N. embargo that was adopted by the U.N. Assembly and supported by this country in 1977 which prohibited support for such things as military assistance, which is and was rather specific.

So the intent is not at all to prohibit any form of guarantee or credit to those things that are not directly related to the military or the police.

Mr. BAUMAN. The second question I have regards subsection (c). Does this subsection apply to nationals of the Republic of South Africa who might subscribe to these principles, because the report on page 6 as it pertains to the original bill's language makes it clear that it was the committee's intent that the prohibition apply not only to the Government of South Africa and its agencies, but to nationals as well, even though that is not stated specifically in the bill?

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BAUMAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. EVANS of Delaware. The intent of subsection (c) is to provide credits or guarantees to private sector purchasers of U.S. goods that do adhere to certain principles. The intent, the objective, of this amendment is to take a reasonable and a rational approach to providing economic opportunity for all South Africans, be they black or white.

Mr. BAUMAN. I thank the gentleman for his explanations.

Mr. RAILSBACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take the 5 minutes because I think it has been very well debated. I want to commend the chairman of the subcommittee and also the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS).

I rise in support of the amendment offered by my colleague from Delaware (Mr. EVANS), which would lessen the restrictions placed on Export-Import Bank transactions involving nationals of the Republic of South Africa.

It is my understanding that section 5 of this bill presently prohibits the Bank from participiating in any transaction involving the Republic of South Africa or its citizens until significant progress toward the elimination of apartheid has been determined by the President. The Evans amendment would allow the Bank to extend credit to South African nationals so long as the U.S. Ambassador to South Africa certifies that the purchaser has fulfilled a set of anti-apartheid requirements. I believe that this amendment would lead to far more significant progress toward the reversal of apartheid in South Africa than would a blanket ban on all Export-Import Bank transactions in that country.

Many responsible black leaders in South Africa hold the view that boycotts, economic sanctions, disinvestment and disengagement will be detrimental and not beneficial to the black people in South Africa. They point out that such sanctions will cause the economy to decline and employment opportunities to decrease. The blacks will be the ones to suffer most because of their loss of jobs and the accompanying loss of economic freedom.

Washington Post columnist William Raspberry recently interviewed Percy Qoboza, the black editor of the South African newspaper the World. Quoboza, who has become something of an international hero for his outspokenness, is quoted by Raspberry as saying:

If you want a complete transformation of this society, the easiest thing to do is get everybody packing up their bags, taking their money out of the country and resisting all forms of investment in the country. But of course the moment you do that, you create economic chaos. And that is a sure guarantee for a full-scale bloody racial confrontation, which would unleash a bloodbath such as we have never seen. Therefore, this is clearly not consistent with my own belief that we must seek a peaceful transformation of the society. So when people talk glibly about disinvestment, I think they ought to realize what they are saying—from 8,000 miles away, from the safe security of distance—"Let the blood flow, and maybe then we'll have a just society."

Mr. EVANS' amendment offers an alternative to disinvestment in South Africa. Instead of ceasing all transactions with that country, a move that may harm the black people, the amendment will serve to encourage the improvement of conditions for the black people, both economically and socially. If a South African purchaser would like to receive credit from the Export-Import Bank, he must be prepared to prove to the U.S. Ambassador that his company has established complete nonsegregation of employees, as well as equal opportunities in the areas of pay and advancement. Efforts must also be made to improve the quality of life for the employees in the areas of housing, transportation, schooling, recreation, and health facilities.

Because the Evans amendment does not abandon the black people of South Africa, but offers an incentive to South African companies to improve the lives and opportunities of these people, I will support this amendment. I encourage my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to carefully consider the debate on the proposal, and support it when the vote is taken.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAILSBACK. I will be happy to yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I do not know whether the gentleman has been here for the whole debate, but early on in the debate it was made clear that we do not have before us a proposal embracing the notion of disinvestment. What we have before us is a proposal which says future additional investments shall be conditioned on these criteria with respect to lending.

Mr. RAILSBACK. No; I understand what the gentleman is saying. Frankly, I do not accept that either. I think that concept is bad, just as I think disinvestment is bad.

Let me just say that I have carefully read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS) which I think is reasonable. In other words, what he is trying to do, in a rather skillful, intelligent way, is send a very good message without, at the same time, doing anything that may end up hurting the blacks.

Mr. MAGUIRE. So the gentleman supports the amendment?

Mr. RAILSBACK. I very strongly support the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. RAILSBACK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MAGUIRE. On the substance of all he said, I would take the gentleman's comments more seriously, frankly, if I thought there was any indication that the South African Government was willing in any way to talk with, consult with, or plan for the future with its nonwhite residents.

I do not think there is any indication that this is, in fact, the case.

Secondly, there are indications that they are systematically eliminating the black leadership in South Africa. When you have 20 people dying under mysterious circumstances in prison over a 20-month period, when you look at the facts, that is the situation.

Mr. RAILSBACK. As the gentleman knows, I do not condone that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. RAILSBACK) has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. MAGUIRE, and by unanimous consent, Mr. RAILSBACK was allowed to proceed for an additional 3 minutes.)

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAILSBACK. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I realize the House wants to move things along very quickly because it is Friday; but I wanted to respond briefly to the gentleman from Illinois. We have worked together and I respect and admire the gentleman.

I suppose in every situation comparable to the situation in South Africa there are divergent points of view. In black America today there is black Washington on the one hand versus Cooper on the other. There are some that say, "Dump the tea and damn the consequences," and others say, "Let us move on in an orderly course."

I suggest to the gentleman that there are certain evils we cannot compromise and when we fight those evils, someone gets hurt.

Mr. RAILSBACK. Mr. Chairman, I have heard the comments of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. MITCHELL) and I thought the gentleman articulated them very well.

I might just add for the Members that I had occasion to talk to the chairman of a rather respected corporation that was part of a Time, Inc. contingent that actually visited several countries in Africa trying to get the pulse of the people. One of the countries they visited was South Africa. They did not just visit with the Government leaders. They actually visited with many of the people that were charged with being radicals, but that were only antigovernment. The business leader with whom I spoke indicated that in talking with the black leaders in South Africa they were just about universally opposed to having the United States do anything that could create severe economic consequences for the blacks as well as the whites in South Africa. This conversation, in addition to the Raspberry column, influences me to believe that we do not want to do anything drastic. We want to do something that is sensible, rational, and reasonable.

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAILSBACK. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Chairman, I could not agree more that we need to do something sensible, rational, and reasonable and certainly not provoke racial war in South Africa. Nothing could be further from our intention today.

Mr. RAILSBACK. That is exactly what Mr. Qoboza said.

Mr. SOLARZ. But Bishop Buthelezi, who is also a leader in South Africa, disagrees with those sentiments and Mr. Qoboza very articulately has said that he hoped the United States would begin to show South Africa our concern with Africa.

I think the Tsongas amendment, as modified by the Evans amendment, is the responsible way to show that position; but to suggest that somehow not doing business with South Africa is going to change them is historically not correct and past history shows that it is not correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. MAGUIRE) to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS).

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment, as amended, offered by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS).

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. ASHBROOK

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ASHBROOK: On page 4, delete Section 5, lines 4 through 13, and renumber the other sections accordingly.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, my amendment eliminates the section 5 prohibition against the Republic of South Africa. I find it incredible that the majority of the committee would impose tight, new restrictions on South Africa while at the same time exempting the People's Republic of China.

What we have here is a classic case of liberal double-think. Apparently it is all right for a government to systematically repress its citizens as long as such repression is conducted by a Communist government. It is only wrong and to be properly punished if conducted by a non-Communist government.

It is time to call a halt to this double standard. Without attempting to defend recent actions of the South African Government, although they can stand up in any comparison with other African nations, I would like to point out the hypocrisy that is being exhibited on this issue. Once again many Members are engaging in selective outrage, violently condemning South Africa while ignoring the denial of basic liberties and murder of innocent people in other regimes.

Despite all of its problems, South Africa is probably the freest and most open nation in Africa. Opposition parties are allowed to exist. The newspapers frequently print articles critical of the Government. People may discuss and comment on political issues.

The black-ruled dictatorships around South Africa display no similar freedom. Look at the internal policies of countries such as Uganda, Mozambique, and Tanzania. Of all the African nations that have gained independence in the last two decades how many can anybody name that have a free and democratic form of government?

South Africa is certainly not a perfect state, but it compares favorably to the rest of the African Continent and to the Communist world. I regret that we are following a course of selective morality and selective outrage.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to direct this inquiry to the gentleman for technical reasons. Relative to the gentleman's amendment, what he intended to do was to strike the original language in section 5 from the bill, and what he now intends to do is to strike the language as amended by the Evans amendment; is that not correct?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Yes the gentleman is correct. By striking the section we would also strike the amendment and all amendments thereto, as I understand it.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, there is an echoing in this Chamber. Twelve years ago I was an intern to then Congressman Brad Morse. I spent my two summers as an intern working on the issue of South Africa.

We put together at that point a 200-page report on what the United States should do to disengage the apartheid policies in South Africa. That was in 1966 and 1967. If I recall correctly, there was a grand total of eight Members of Congress who were willing to sign the statement that I drafted at that point regarding what was then the Members' ICJ position on Namibia, then South West Africa.

The argument used against our position at that point was: "Let's not do anything. Let's not rock the boat; things will evolve. Things will get better."

I considered that to be a rather shallow argument 12 years ago and one I would have been embarrassed to pursue myself. But to argue today 12 years later that that same approach should be followed, I think, speaks for itself. Events will overtake us. It is my hope that the Congress today will try to get ahead of them.

Mr. Chairman, let me quote from the Washington Post of May 4, 1978:

> The political meaning of the Tsongas amendment is nonetheless clear. The American public's consciousness of apartheid is being raised. From the administration, the idea has spread to Congress that American relations with South Africa will inevitably deteriorate further if Pretoria is not seen to be moving with all deliberate speed to alter the nature of a system that virtually all Americans, regardless of their differences on tactics, regard as an abomination and as a temptation to society-wide violence. Many in South Africa seem to feel their country can tough it out: circumvent or survive the Carter administration and find more "understanding" for apartheid elsewhere in the American body politic. The Tsongas amendment says South Africa is wrong.

Mr. Chairman, it is time for this Congress to say exactly the same thing.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Ashbrook amendment. I will endeavor not to repeat the many eloquent arguments that have been made with respect to this issue. But I would like to speak very specifically and, hopefully, very profoundly to the rather fragile argument that my distinguished colleague raises when he articulates the notion of selective morality, and take the Members back, for just a moment, in responding as directly as I can, to that argument of several years ago in this country. The very same arguments applied then, probably offered by the very same mentality that offers them now, when blacks in this country began to challenge the evil of racism, discrimination, prejudice, Jim Crow, and oppression that existed in the South of this country.

Many people said this happens all over America. Why are you singling out the South? There are racists in Berkeley, there are racists in New York, there are racists all over America. Why should we challenge the South with all of these civil rights movements? This is selective morality.

Mr. Chairman, Martin Luther King was a brilliant man. He understood, from the standpoint of strategic tactics, as well as principles, that indeed, it was true that the evils of racism and prejudice and oppression did exist for blacks, browns, reds, yellows, women, and many other people all over our country.

But he knew that, in order for the rest of the country to introspect about the evil that was being perpetrated across the country, we had to challenge that evil where it was most symbolic, where it had longevity, where it had history of high visibility. For in challenging it where it was most evil, we were then able to challenge it where it was considered more subtly.

Mr. Chairman, South Africa is the South of the world. I would agree that human rights violations exist all over the world, including this country. The fact that the Wilmington 10 are still in jail is testimony to that reality. The United Nations has never given us sanctions and said we are not violative of human rights.

So, yes, indeed, just as civil rights was a journey that this Nation had to go on, starting in the South of America, human rights is, indeed, a journey that the entire world must go on.

Mr. Chairman, I would ask my colleagues to consider this: My distinguished colleague indicated that this is a commercial world, where all we do is commercial business. We have an interest, I say to my colleagues, in challenging the evil in South Africa for this important reason; today the world is growing smaller, and countries are increasingly interdependent and interrelated. Anyone who does not understand that is either a fool or a naif, and I would hope that none of my colleagues fall into these categories. But the problems of war and peace proliferate. Nuclear weapons, ecological problems, economic problems, problems of hunger, malnutrition, starvation in the world, these are issues which transcend national borders, which will require the highest and best in all of us. It will require our ability to communicate. But we certainly must overcome the ravages of human rights if we are ever going to deal with the problems of such magnitude that I have just articulated.

Mr. Chairman, South Africa has to journey, in terms of how it deals with human beings in 1978, given the magnitude and the perplexity of the problem.

That there are still some white people on the face of this Earth who still believe that they are superior, this is inane, this is stupid. It would seem to me that this Congress, this great deliberative body, representing the American people, ought to be the champions of human freedom.

Yes, we started a journey in the South of this country relative to human rights, a journey that this country is still embarking upon. The journey for human rights is one which has to continue. We have heard talk about Uganda, China, other places. I agree that human rights is not a reality all over the world, but let us start it where it is most evil, where it is most vocal and visible.

How can a handful of people at this moment in the evolvement of our history still believe the insane, ludicrous notion that they are superior to other people on the basis of color of skin? This is incredible. It would seem to me that we should not in any way embrace that notion. And for the gentleman to offer a motion to strike, even a flimsy, weak gesture, to make this statement, defies my understanding. We have a profound obligation here, if we are committed to anything, to deal with the question. So let us start with South Africa.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. DELLUMS was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think he has taken a very moderate approach in this debate.

Mr. DELLUMS. I do not feel very moderate. I feel very angry, because of the ludicrous nature of the debate that has occurred thus far.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I imagine it was on the basis of all of the debate thus far that I did not feel it was necessary to bombastically point out all of the reasons I feel I should support this amendment.

I think my colleague from California is properly pointing out the problems of South Africa, but I think there are equal problems throughout Africa to which we are not addressing ourselves. The gentleman is simply saying, from his point of view, here he thinks the worst problem is, while overlooking other African nations which have similar problems.

Mr. DELLUMS. That is not my assertion, that we overlook these realities.

I have suggested, for example, in a number of conversations with the distinguished gentleman that what this House of Representatives ought to do is establish some mechanism which allows us to define what the hell we mean by human rights. Here on the floor we do not know. Most of us are talking between our ears, and we do not understand what we mean.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) has again expired.

(On request of Mr. BROWN of Michigan and by unanimous consent, Mr. DELLUMS was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, it is not my suggestion that we ignore it. My suggestion is that we find some competent capable way of defining the issue in some nonpolitical terms so that those on the right do not attack the left, and those on the left do not attack the right. Let us attack the problems of the violation of human rights regardless of where the violation occurs.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The only thing I would say to my friend, the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS), is that I agree with him 100 percent on this point.

The fact that we do not have a basic guide for human rights is the best argument for my amendment. I happen to think that Liberia impinges on the civil rights and human rights of many people by placing in their constitution a provision that a person of my race cannot own property there. Do you think that is a human rights violation or not? Until we seriously address this problem as my friend states we will be floundering around on amendments and section 5's of this and other bills.

We cannot go to any nation and talk intelligently until we define what human rights are and apply them uniformly.

Again, I think that what the gentleman says is the best argument for my amendment.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, my response is simply that if Dr. Martin Luther King and others had not dealt with the problem in the South, we would still be dealing with human rights in this country.

We have to start somewhere. Where the problem is highly visible is the place at which it has to start. Then we can deal with areas in which it has manifested itself.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) for what he has said about selective morality. I think he has laid that one to rest.

The fact is that the apartheid-boasting minority of South Africa are the descendants of Dutch and British people, two peoples who have followed progressive and human rights-oriented goals. Of those to whom much is given by way of heritage, much shall be required, so I do not think we need to waste any time here today in discussing other horrible things on the face of the globe.

The language of the amendment addresses itself to South Africa, and that is what we should vote on.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I thank my colleague, the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. DELLUMS was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DOWNEY. First of all, Mr. Chairman, I think the reality of this amendment is that it is a blueprint for doing nothing.

My friend, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. REUSS), the chairman of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, has also pointed out what we are dealing with is a country which holds itself to be a 20th century democracy, with the rule of law of a democracy.

Mr. Chairman, I think at the same time it systematically represses 10 million people. The hypocrisy of that regime speaks for itself.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, in the remaining moments I have, I would simply like to point out to my distinguished colleagues that we have to hope for a world in which we have people capable of living with each other in peace, in a spirit of cooperation, and with human dignity. That cannot occur as long as there is not equity in our perception of each other as human beings or as long as we continue to see ourselves as superior and inferior. We will never have peace. We will never have the kind of tranquility which we definitely need.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment speaks to South Africa. Let us address that reality. I do not think anyone here can give me an articulate reason that we should not challenge the South African regime. I do not think anyone here can stand up and argue eloquently in defense of the inhumaneness in South Africa.

Given that reality, let us vote down this amendment, because it strikes at even the most modest effort on the part of this committee to do something we should have done a long time ago, and that is to strike a blow for human freedom and human dignity all over the world.

If South Africa is the place in which to start, let us start there.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, this debate I think is tremendous, for it discusses all aspects of the problem, and I think the gentleman who preceded me in the well has stated the position toward apartheid of most of the Members of the House. But, that is not the issue in this legislation. The issue in this legislation is, do we accomplish, do we have a better chance of accomplishing that cause which has been so well espoused here in the well by having language that constitutes a ban on the use of the Bank's facilities pertaining to South Africa, or leave the law in such a way that the needs of South Africa for the utilization of the Bank can be leveraged to accomplish the social goals we all apparently champion?

Now then, probably 95 percent of the utilization of the Bank is really of no great significance to South Africa. They can get similar help from the French, the Japanese, the British, or around the world. But, there are some things that probably are very important, and utilization of the Bank with respect to these transactions is very important to South Africa. Would not it be much better to permit the President—as he has already done to a certain extent—to permit the President in these critical areas where it is essential to utilize the Bank by South Africa, to say to the South African Government, "I will waive the prohibition. I will waive the prohibition if you show me progress in the human rights, elimination of apartheid areas. You have this matter pending before you. Show me progress, and I will consider it and I will consider authorizing the transaction."

That way, we have leverage. That way, we just do not deal in rhetoric. We actually have a mechanism for accomplishing that which I hope we all want to accomplish, and not just talk about it.

I wonder how many Members who have spoken in the well this morning in support of the basic ban or some kind of provision to limit access to the Bank, I wonder how many have talked to the President and urged him to exercise the authority he already has to limit or ban any Export-Import Bank involvement in transactions affecting South Africa or South African firms? I commend the gentleman from Maryland; I commend the gentleman from California in that they may have been successful in part, although I think the policy has been in existence longer than that.

There are no extensions of credit to South Africa at the present time—no extensions of credit. There are no guarantees or insurance, I do not believe, beyond 2 years. I see a gentleman shaking his head, and I would be glad to be corrected—3 years? But, in any case, the President under existing authority has imposed limitations. He can at the present time totally terminate South African access by the Government of, or by firms in, South Africa, to the Export-Import Bank.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TSONGAS. The point of the amendment is this. If the action is taken solely by the Executive this will happen.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Before the gentleman proceeds, does not the gentleman see the logic of my argument about the leverage, that something of greater significance can be accomplished by leverage than by bans?

Mr. TSONGAS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman so long as he addresses himself to my basic statement rather than if he just repeats what we have already heard more than twice.

Mr. TSONGAS. But if in South Africa he would say to himself they cannot do that in that way, there is a unified American approach, that is the difference.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROWN) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BROWN of Michigan was allowed to proceed for 30 additional seconds.)

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, what makes anyone think that a law passed by the Congress, that can be repealed at any time, has in some way greater perpetuity than a President who will at least serve until 1980?

Mr. CHARLES WILSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, with my unrestrained tendency to be on the losing side, I rise to support the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

I would first like to say, when the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. MAGUIRE) passed this letter out condemning the death of Steve Biko, I was anxious to be a signer.

I would also like to say that over Easter when I was in South Africa, I have never been more horrified than I was by the conditions that exist in Soweto. I was absolutely stunned. I could not believe it. I did not have any discussions with Afrikaaners that did not deteriorate into a quarrel, including the breaking up of a dinner party in a rather distressing fashion. But I would like to give a little bit of insight that I got in South Africa during my visit to Soweto when I was out there.

The big difference between the United States and the Government of South Africa now has to do with the proposal of the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DIGGS), the chairman of the South African Subcommittee. He had a great success, because he was able to get the little pathetic YMCA that exists there—built with charities from South African citizens—through great effort Mr. DIGGS was able to get them to set aside one room in the YMCA as a reading room. They are lined up waiting to get into it, because it is the only place they can get books and read about Martin Luther King and George Washington Carver and other successful American blacks.

We have appropriated the money to build a library there and so far South Africa will not even let us build a library there for those people so they can read.

But the point of this story was that in Soweto I had conversations with three or four of the black leaders, most of whom spent most of their time in jail. I did not find any that did not think that economic sanctions at this time—and this had to be considered an economic sanction—by the United States in an explicit and definitive way such as this would deteriorate progress that is being made.

American corporations are the only people there that are willing to pay equal pay for equal work. I could not find any people that did not feel any economic losses South Africa suffered would fall most heavily upon the oppressed people of Soweto. For that reason I will join the small band that supports this amendment.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHARLES WILSON of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Did the gentleman feel people who spoke to him felt completely free when they expressed their views to him?

Mr. CHARLES WILSON of Texas. I would like to address that. This is what caused the breakdown of the dinner party. There was an Indian there who was a very militant civil rights advocate and very much an opponent of the regime. And at the dinner party I asked him, I said: "All right now," he happened to favor economic sanctions, I presume, but I asked him: "Just tell me when I go back, because I will write a report, do you think I should write it favoring or opposing economic sanctions?"

He did not answer me. I said: "Answer me." He said: "I cannot, because with the people here at this table, if I answered you truthfully, I would be banned by morning."

That impressed me a great deal.

Mr. MAGUIRE. That is the point I am trying to make.

Mr. CHARLES WILSON of Texas. After that whenever I spoke to any of the black leaders I spoke to them alone, out in the streets.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further so that I might pursue this point with the gentleman, it would seem to me that there may not be a representative sample of feelings as a result of a couple of conversations the gentleman had.

Mr. CHARLES WILSON of Texas. You can only deal with your instincts, but I do believe that the blacks I talked to trusted me. I have done some specific things for a couple of them, and I spoke to them only when it was impossible to have any sort of electronic surveillance whatever and I think that they were telling me the truth.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I might mention that there are others, such as Donald Woods, who is a white, and groups such as Amnesty International, the American Committee on Africa, church groups, and others, who I believe are in close touch with black opinion there and who would, I believe, contradict the gentleman in his position.

Mr. CHARLES WILSON of Texas. Have they said that we should invoke economic sanctions?

Mr. MAGUIRE. Yes, many black South African leaders do. But what I am saying is that these groups who are in touch with black spokesmen in South Africa give a different account than the gentleman has given.

Mr. CHARLES WILSON of Texas. Do not misunderstand, I speak not one word in favor of the social system in South Africa.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(On request of Mr. DELLUMS, and by unanimous consent, Mr. CHARLES WILSON of Texas was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHARLES WILSON of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman mentioned a few seconds ago that one has to operate on one's instinct and I think the gentleman is correct. Let me take you back again, historically so as to use an analogy—the civil rights movement. At that time there were many people who talked about the black leaders, and who frequently quoted them, but I always wondered who the black leaders were, because it seemed that the people were deciding who the black leadership was based upon their own views.

I have talked to people in South Africa and they have said, "Bring on your economic sanctions because it will be a blow toward establishing human freedoms and an effort toward establishing human dignity for us. We can handle the economic sanctions, because we know there is a purpose and a time frame that is involved which allows us to endure. We are people who can struggle within that time frame, because we know that ultimately this strategic approach can assist in the achievement of our dream of freedom and bring us human dignity."

So, the gentleman can quote black South Africans who say, "Don't bring down the economic sanctions," that is true, but I can quote many, many more who say, "Bring on the economic sanctions, because they are preferable to what we have now and through that strategy we can achieve our goals and we will be able to preserve our freedoms and our dignity. Through this we will be able to challenge the supremacy theory." Thus, the gentleman is correct. One must trust one's instincts.

If those instincts embrace the principles of freedom and dignity, I say that we should strike down the amendment before us at this time.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHARLES WILSON of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Chairman, first of all let me say that I am sure the gentleman from Texas does abhor apartheid. But is the gentleman familiar with the Senate report on American corporate activities in South Africa? Because it contradicts some of the things the gentleman has just said.

Mr. CHARLES WILSON of Texas. Is the gentleman referring to Senator CLARK's report?

Mr. DOWNEY. That is correct.

It says that the net effect of American investment has been to strengthen the economic and military self-sufficiency of South Africa's apartheid regime, undermining the fundamental goals and objectives of U.S. foreign policy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

(On request of Mr. DOWNEY and by unanimous consent, Mr. CHARLES WILSON of Texas was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I repeat, it says that it is undermining the fundamental goals and objectives of U.S. foreign policy.

Whatever they are.

But I think the point is clear that the American corporate involvement has been aimed, again to quote the report:

> But by comparison with the abysmal performance of U.S. corporations in the past, these efforts to express condemnations of apartheid, and exert a measure of influence toward its erosion, represent some degree or process in the directions of a socially responsible multinational role in a society that has shown little capacity for significant change on its own.

I think they are changing, but I still have the feeling that it was the same in the years prior to the Second World War when there were those who argued that we should do business with Nazi Germany and with Japan and in that way we possibly could get them to change, but that did not prove to be true. And the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) has given the same argument that nothing has changed in the last 12 years, and, therefore, this is one of the very first starts.

It would show the South Africans that, hopefully, then we are, as a government, going to have less and less to do with them without precipitating revolution, without precipitating bloodshed, but giving us as a government some voice so that in the future when majority rule does come to South Africa, we will be able to say we participated; we wanted to see it happen and we wanted to see it happen nonviolently, and this is one of the ways in which we can achieve that goal.

Mr. CHARLES WILSON of Texas. I understand the gentleman's position perfectly. I simply disagree with it.

In closing, I would like to say that in line with what some of the members of the minority have said, it does seem to me to be an impossible double standard. I would prefer to be a black in Soweto than to be a Jew in much of Eastern Europe. I think we should keep those things in mind.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.
